

BOYS, READ THE RADIO ARTICLES IN THIS NUMBER

No. 969

APRIL 25, 1924

Price 8 Cents

FAME & FORTUNE WEEKLY.

STORIES OF
BOYS THAT MAKE MONEY. 4

A FAVORITE OF FORTUNE; OR, STRIKING IT RICH IN WALL STREET.

AND OTHER STORIES

By A SELF-MADE MAN.

"This is where we get square with you, young man," cried William Higgins, stooping down and shaking his red, hairy fist before Jack's face. "You ought to be thankful that we don't blow the top of your head off."

Are You A Radio Fan? Read Pages 24 and 25

FAME AND FORTUNE WEEKLY

Issued weekly—Subscription price, $4.00 per year; Canada, $4.50; Foreign, $5.00. Harry E. Wolff, Publisher, Inc., 166 West 23d Street, New York, N. Y. Entered as Second-Class Matter, October 4, 1911, at the Post-Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3, 1879.

No. 969

NEW YORK, APRIL 25, 1924

Price 8 Cents.

A Favorite of Fortune

OR, STRIKING IT RICH IN WALL STREET

By A SELF-MADE MAN

CHAPTER I.—Jack Holland and His Friend Dick Garland Arrive in New York.

"Keb! Keb, young gents! Keb! Keb!"

These were the cries that greeted a couple of well-built, good-looking boys as they came out of the Grand Central Station, on Forty-second street, New York City, one dull March afternoon. They had just arrived on the Montreal Express from Athens, a large town in northern New York, and this was their first appearance in the great American metropolis. No one would have taken them for country boys, however. They were well dressed, in city style, bright as a couple of new pennies and active and alert as a pair of monkeys. Their names were Jack Holland and Dick Garland, and their ages were about the same—that is fifteen.

They stopped and stared for a moment at the line of beckoning and boisterous cabmen drawn up across the sidewalk.

"Keb, gents! Where do you want to go?" asked one of the men, stepping up to Jack and reaching for his grip.

"Don't be in such a rush, cabby," said Jack, drawing back. "We don't want a cab. We're going to take a car."

The cabmen drew back with a look of disappointment and began yelling at somebody else.

"What car do we take, Jack?" asked Dick, looking up and down the street in a puzzled way.

"The crosstown one. We change at Eighth avenue to a car that'll take us down to Twenty-third, within half a block of Mrs. Blake's place."

"All right. You've got the directions, so it's up to you to land us at our destination all right."

"Don't you worry, Dick. We'll get to Blake's in time for dinner."

"I hope we will, for I'm beginning to feel rather hollow under my vest."

"It seemed to me that you ate enough at Poughkeepsie to last you for a week," grinned Jack.

"What are you talking about? I didn't have more than a bite."

"If you call that a bite, I don't know what you consider a full meal. Mrs. Blake has agreed to give us a double room with board for ten per, but maybe she'll raise the ante after she gets on to the size of your appetite."

"Oh, you get out."

"Come on. Move lively. Here comes our car."

"How do you know it's our car?"

"Don't you see that little sign above the motorman's head. It says 'crosstown.' Come now, follow me if you don't want to get lost."

Jack led the way, signalled the motorman, and they were soon aboard the car.

"Let us out at Eighth avenue, conductor," said Jack, as he tendered a dime for their fare.

"I wonder if we shall like our boarding-house?" asked Dick.

"Give it up. My father answered the advertisement in the Herald and took the rooms for us. If we don't like it we can move. The woods are full of boarding places in New York."

"I wonder what sort of a looking place Wall Street is?" asked Dick.

"You'll find out in the morning when you report for work at Fletcher Co., and start in to learn the ropes as a stock broker's messenger."

"So will you, for you're to work as Howard Golding's messenger. You won't be a bit better than me, Jack Holland. We both get $6 per."

"That won't go far. Five dollars for board and room and the other dollar for washing and carfare. Until we get a raise our paternal parents will have to supply the needful to make good our other expenses. My governor allows me $2."

"Same here."

"We can't be high rollers on that, can we, Dick?" grinned Jack.

"I should say not. We'll have to economize. Save the pennies and the dollars will take care of themselves."

"Eighth avenue, young fellows," bawled the conductor at this moment.

They got out of the car.

"I thought you were keeping your eyes skinned?" said Dick. "If the conductor hadn't warned us we might have gone on to the river."

"Don't worry over little things, Dick. Here's the car we want to take, so get aboard and don't keep the motorman waiting."

In a very short time they were landed at the corner of Twenty-third street.

"Which side of the street is Mrs. Blake's?" asked Dick.

"On the north side. The south side seems to be made up of business houses exclusively."

"Nice wide street, isn't it?"

"It's all right. Now follow me, sonny, and I'll lead you to our caravansary."

"Caravansary is good," grinned Dick. "When shall we get our trunks?"

"When the transfer people deliver them."

"Thanks. When will that be?"

"About eight o'clock. If they come at half-past seven we can take in a show."

"What show?"

"We might go to the Grand Opera House. It's handy."

"Where is it?"

"Just back of you on the corner of the street. Why don't you use your eyes? I saw it the moment I got off the car."

"I wasn't thinking about theaters."

"Neither was I, but I always see what's before my eyes."

"How much further have we got to walk?"

"Two doors. Here we are. This is Mrs. Blake."

Jack opened a small iron gate, walked up a narrow gravel path, mounted a flight of steps, and pulled an old-fashioned bell knob. Dick was right behind him and heard the jangle of a bell somewhere in the basement. A servant answered the summons, and Jack asked for Mrs. Blake.

"She's out. Are you the boys she expects?"

"I guess we are, Miss Sally," replied Jack.

"My name isn't Sally," replied the servant, with a toss of her head. "It's Mary Ellen."

"Thanks, Mary Ellen. Will you guide us to our room?"

"Will you tell me your names, please? There are so many sneak thieves in New York that one can't be too careful whom we admit to the house."

"I hope we don't look like that gentry, Mary Ellen. My name is Jack Holland, and this young man is known as Dick Garland. We hail from Athens, not Greece, but good old New York."

"You seem to be the parties the missus expects. Step inside, and I'll show you upstairs."

"Have you an elevator?" chuckled Jack.

"No, we haven't," replied the girl, tartly.

"How far up do we have to go?"

"Three flights up."

"All right. Lead on. We will follow you."

They were presently ushered into a very pleasant, though not elaborately furnished room.

"The bathroom is on the floor below at the end of the hall."

"Thanks, Mary Ellen," replied Jack.

"If the room gets too warm for you turn off that damper in the baseboard," said the girl, pointing to the hot-air flue.

"Thanks again, Mary Ellen; but I've been told it never gets too warm in a New York boarding-house except in summer, and that's some distance away yet."

The girl looked suspiciously at Jack, but he kept a straight face.

"We always keep a good fire in the furnace," she said, rather haughtily, the boys thought. "I ought to know, for I look after it myself."

"Then we'll take your word for it, Mary Ellen."

"Is there anything I can do for you two?"

"Not at present, Mary Ellen. We will call you if we need you."

The girl gave Jack a look that made Dick cover his mouth to prevent himself from laughing outright. Then she walked solemnly to the door, opened it and walked out.

CHAPTER II.—Jack in Wall Street.

Jack and his friend Dick opened up their grips and took therefrom their combs, brushes and other toilet incidentals. Then they washed up, removing such evidences of their long journey from their clothes as they noticed, and after that sat down by one of the windows to criticize the rear prospect, or backs of the houses fronting on Twenty-fourth street. Presently there came a knock on the door.

"Come in," cried Jack, wondering if that was Mary Ellen back again.

A tall, thin, genteel-looking woman walked into the room. She was attired in a dark dress and had eye-glasses perched on her nose.

"Good-afternoon, young gentlemen. I am pleased to make your acquaintance and welcome you to New York."

She held out one hand as she advanced.

"You are Mrs. Blake, I presume," said Jack, advancing to meet her.

"I am. You are——"

"Jack Holland."

"Ah! It was your father——"

"Who wrote you and secured this room. Exactly. Allow me to introduce my friend, Dick Garland."

Mrs. Blake bowed, and so did Dick.

"Dinner will be ready in half an hour. I presume both of you are hungry after your journey. Come right down as soon as you hear the bell."

"Thank you, ma'am, we will."

As the boarding missus had nothing more to say she excused herself and left the room. Presently they descended to the dining-room in the basement, being guided thereto by certain sounds that could not be mistaken.

"Sit here, young gentlemen," said Mrs. Blake, indicating two chairs near the head of the table.

Mary Ellen brought in two plates of rather watery vegetable soup, and before the boys had finished it other boarders came down, and Jack and Dick were introduced to them. Mr. Blake, a ponderous-looking man, with a very mild manner, sat at the head of the table next to Jack. A slick-looking young man, who said he worked in an office in lower Broadway, occupied a place opposite the boys, with a tall, angular, literary lady on his left. There were also a widow with two grown-up daughters, whose ages could only be guessed at; a couple of store clerks, who had to return to their work after the meal; three young women stenographers, and several others.

Neither Jack nor Dick had much to say, though the sharp young man tried to engage them in conversation. The stenographers cast eyes in their direction quite often, remarking among themselves what nice young fellows they appeared to be. As soon as they had finished their meal they returned to their room to await the arrival of their trunks. The baggage came at quarter past seven, which left them free to go to the Grand Opera House, where a popular musical comedy held the boards. They returned to their boarding place at eleven and went at once to bed. Next morning after breakfast Jack and Dick walked up to Broadway together and took a car bound for the Battery. They got off at Wall Street and walked down that narrow thoroughfare, past Nassau street, until they came to No. —, an office building, on the second floor front of which was the office of Howard Golding, stock broker, where Jack was going to work as messenger. Here they parted for the time being, Dick going a few doors further on to the office of Fletcher & Co., stock brokers, which was a step or two below the street level.

Mr. Golding was an old friend of Jack's father, and he had written to Mr. Holland, who had a large family and was not in very affluent circumstances, offering to take his son Jack into his office and put him in the way of learning the brokerage business. Mr. Holland gratefully accepted the offer, but the boy didn't want to come to New York without his chum, Dick Garland, who was also anxious to get a position in Wall Street.

Accordingly Jack's father wrote to Mr. Golding asking if he could find an opening in another office for young Dick. The broker very obligingly interested himself in the matter and secured for Dick the position of messenger in Fletcher & Co.'s. The two delighted boys made hurried preparations for leaving their homes, and on the morning of the day we introduced them to the reader at the Grand Central depot they boarded the Montreal Express at the Athens depot, and as we have seen, duly reached New York. As soon as Jack left his chum he walked up the stairway to the second floor and entered the outer office of Howard Golding. A pleasant-featured boy was seated in the room reading a newspaper, and our hero asked him if Mr. Golding was in.

"He hasn't got here yet," was the reply he received, so Jack said he'd take a seat and wait till the broker made his appearance, which he did in about half an hour.

"So you are Georges Holland's son Jack, eh?" said Mr. Golding, with a smile when the boy introduced himself.

"Yes, sir," replied Jack, in his pleasant, bright way.

The broker regarded him with an approving eye.

"When did you arrive in the city?"

"Yesterday afternoon, sir."

"Your friend Garland came with you, I suppose?"

"Yes, sir. We came downtown together this morning, and he went to Fletcher & Co., where you were so kind as to get him a position."

Mr. Golding asked Jack many questions, told him what would be expected of him as the office messenger, and then called his present messenger inside.

"William," said the broker, "this is your successor. He is a stranger in New York. Kindly initiate him in his duties, so that when you leave me he will be qualified to take your place."

"Yes, sir," replied the other boy, regarding Jack with considerable interest. "What is your name?" he asked, when the two walked out into the reception-room.

"Jack Holland."

"Mine is Will Baldwin. Where do you hail from?"

"Athens, Saratoga county, in this State."

"There's not much of the hayseed about you," said Will, with a smile.

"I hope not," replied Jack, with a grin. "Though I'm pretty green as far as this town is concerned."

"You won't remain so long. Now, as the old man has put it up to me to break you in, you had better go about with me everywhere."

"That suits me."

Baldwin then explained to his successor exactly what his duties would be.

"When you're in the office you will occupy this chair. When visitors call and inquire for Mr. Golding, if he is in you will take their names into the private room, and if the boss is willing to see them you will show them into his sanctum—otherwise not. When business is brisk, which happens at any moment, in longer or shorter spells, according to how the market is going and the interest the outside public takes in the Street, you will be kept on the hop, skip and jump for four or five hours a day carrying messages to the offices of various brokers in this neighborhood, to the New street entrance of the New York Stock Exchange, to banks, trust companies and other places, as required. During those times you're not likely to get a chance to lunch until two o'clock. When times are dull you will be able to eat earlier if you want to. One of your duties will be to take the day's deposit to the Manhattan National Bank. You will have also to go to the postoffice twice a day. By the way, I'd better introduce you to Mr. Day, our cashier. Come with me."

Jack was made acquainted with the cashier, and that gentleman expressed his pleasure at knowing him.

Will also introduced Jack to Miss Dickie Lingard, the stenographer, and to the clerks in the counting-room, who welcomed the new employee with much cordiality.

CHAPTER III.—Among the Bulls and Bears.

Soon after ten o'clock Mr. Golding went to the Exchange. A short time afterward a messenger boy entered with a note for the broker, which he handed in to Mr. Day and hurried away. The cashier called Will Baldwin, handed him the note, and told him to take it over to the exchange.

"Come along, Jack. I will introduce you to the stamping grounds of the bulls and bears."

The two boys, who were now on excellent terms, departed for New street together. A few minutes later they entered the rear end of the large room used by the members of the New York Exchange for the transaction of their business. Jack wasn't easily astonished at anything he saw, but this case was an exception. While they stood at the gate waiting for an attendant to hunt up Mr. Golding he gazed almost open-mouthed at the scene of noise and confusion which the floor presented.

Mr. Golding came up, took the message from Will's hands, read it and walked away.

"You'll get used to this place in a short time."

said Baldwin as the boys left the Exchange and the strident roar melted away behind them.

Everywhere Will carried a message that day Jack went with him. They also went to lunch together down at a Broad street quick-lunch counter. Whenever they ran across a prominent broker on the street Will pointed him out to Jack, and the new messenger registered his countenance in his brain for future use if needed. Jack asked his companion many questions about stock market methods, all of which Baldwin obligingly answered to the best of his ability. The more Jack saw of the financial district the more interested in it he became. The brokers seemed to be a merry lot, in spite of their buccaneering methods on the floor of the Exchange. An evidence of this was presented to Jack when he and Will visited the board room for the second time before the place closed for the day. A stout, dignified-looking broker was walking across the floor when a fellow member on the edge of a crowd around the Erie standard suddenly turned around and with a sly stroke sent his tall hat spinning upon the floor. The victim, amid a general titter, chased his headgear, and then returned to wreck vengeance on the guilty one. He thought he had recognized his aggressor, who, with an innocent expression on his countenance, was intent on his memorandum book. It happened, however, that his suspicions centered on the man beside the real mischief-maker, and with a vigorous swoop of his hand he knocked the gentleman's hat off with the remark that "two could play at that game."

His mistake involved him in a scrimmage with the aggrieved party, and a dozen other brokers got mixed up in it before matters were finally straightened out.

Jack, who had been an interested observer of this horseplay, was tickled to death and laughed long and loud over the scrap.

"You wouldn't think men engaged in serious business would cut up like that," he said to Baldwin when they got outside.

"Oh, they're up to all sorts of larks. Brokers are unlike any other class of men in business hours. They often act just like a pack of school-boys. It seems to be one of the customs of the Street from way back."

"I think I'd like to be a broker," said Jack.

"Well, you're in line now to pick up the business. If you make yourself solid with Mr. Golding he'll give you every opportunity to get ahead. Study up stock exchange methods, take a little flyer in the market once in a while, if you have the cash to spare, so as to get your hand in, and maybe some day, when you have acquired funds enough, you will be able to hang out your own shingle."

"I should think a man would require a great deal of capital to carry on this business, where a single transaction often amounts to a hundred thousand dollars or more."

"Yes, but not so much as you may imagine. I haven't time to explain all that to you now, but you'll get next to it yourself in the course of time if you continue to work in Wall Street."

At three o'clock Dick Garland entered Golding's office.

"How do you like it as far as you've gone?" Jack asked him, with a grin.

"Tiptop. Fletcher's regular messenger is showing me the ropes. He leaves Saturday for Philadelphia, where he has a job with his uncle. How are you getting on?"

"Like a bird. Let me introduce you to Will Baldwin. He's got charge of me for the present. Baldwin, this is my old chum, Dick Garland."

"Glad to know you, Garland," said Will, as the two boys shook hands.

"Same here."

"You're from Athens, too, aren't you?"

"Sure thing. It's the greatest town in the country next to New York."

"Don't mind him, Will," said Jack, with a chuckle. "He'll get over it in time."

"Get over what?" asked Dick, suspiciously.

Jack tapped his forehead and looked solemn.

"Do you mean to say I'm——" began Dick.

"Lightheaded? Sure you are," replied Jack.

"Well, if you haven't a nerve!" cried Dick, indignantly. "I'm no more lightheaded than you are."

"You aren't?" replied Jack, in seeming astonishment. "I'll leave it to you, Baldwin. Look at the color of his hair."

Dick tumbled to the joke, for he was something of a blond, and grinned.

"All right," he retorted. "You got me that time, but I'll get square with you at the first chance, see if I don't."

"Say," said Baldwin, "you fellows better come along with me, and I'll show you all around the district, so that you can get the lay of the ground."

This proposition was agreeable to Jack and Dick, and for the next two hours Will piloted them around the neighborhood from Pearl street to Broadway and from Wall street to the Battery. He told them the name of the different streets, pointed out all the prominent office buildings and other edifices of note and worked in a good many laughable experiences he had been through during his two years' stay in the Street.

"By the way, Baldwin," said Jack, "you didn't tell me why you are getting out of Wall Street. I shouldn't think you'd want to give up such a fine job."

"I'm going to Chicago with my folks. My father has just got a dandy position as general manager of a large manufacturing plant out there, and he's going to give me a swell posish. I get $8 here, while in Chicago I'm going to start in at $10, with the certainty of a raise every once in a while as I deserve it."

"That isn't so bad. I wish you luck," said Jack.

Shortly afterward Jack and Dick parted from Baldwin and went to their boarding-house.

CHAPTER IV.—Saved by a Hair.

"Jack," said Mr. Golding, coming out of his private office, and handing his messenger an envelope, "take this to Mr. Bullock."

"Yes, sir," replied the boy promptly, springing from his chair, where he had been reading the previous day's quotations in the Wall Street News.

Jack put on his hat and darted for the door opening onto the corridor, while his employer went into the railed-off counting-room to see his cashier. Our hero had now been a year in Wall Street, and what he thought he didn't know about the financial district wasn't worth mentioning. He had buckled right down to business from the start in a way that pleased Mr. Golding immensely. Jack started for Broad street at a smart pace. He knew that Bullock & Co. had their offices in the Vanderpool Building, in Exchange Place. It was near the noon hour and the streets were crowded with brokers, messenger boys and others whose business or curiosity called them to that locality. Half way down the block between Wall Street and Exchange Place some men with a stout wagon were hoisting a small steel safe to the tenth floor of a tall office building. There were the usual warning signs, tin placards with the word "Danger" painted in red letters on them, posted on either side of the sidewalk in front of the building, but many persons paid very little attention to them. Jack stopped for a moment to watch the slowly ascending safe, on which a man was perched to keep it from defacing the projecting parts of the building. Suddenly one of the ropes holding the safe snapped with a report like a pistol. A second followed, and the man grabbed the pulley ropes to save himself. A hundred people, attracted by the noise, looked up and held their breath as they saw the safe slipping out of the embrace of the remaining ropes. Its descent to the sidewalk was now only a matter of a few seconds, and the men on the wagon shouted hoarse cries of warning to nearby pedestrians, which were taken up by passers-by as they skipped hastily from the danger zone. Jack started to fly, too, when at that critical moment an old gentleman came out of the main entrance to the building and started directly across the walk under the suspended safe.

"Great Scott!" gasped the boy. "He'll be killed."

A medley of cries were hurled at the old gentleman. He heard them, realized that something was wrong, and stopped stock still in the worst spot of all, apparently confused and uncertain what to do. It was a thrilling moment for nearly five hundred people, not one of whom dared rush to his assistance. There was one, however, who was equal to the emergency. That one was Jack Holland, boy though he was.

He saw that in a few seconds the safe would be released and descend like a flash on the old gentleman's head.

"I must save him," he muttered.

To resolve to do a thing was to act with Jack Holland. Without wasting a moment to calculate his chances he darted right for the old gentleman, while a cry of surprise and almost horror arose from the crowd.

Crack! The ropes parted and like a flash of light down came the safe. But Jack had swept the old gentleman with him down into the doorway of a broker's office just as the safe struck the pavement with a crash that was heard some blocks away. A cloud of fractured pavement splinters arose into the air. Much of it followed Jack and the man he had saved by a hair, and fell upon their clothes as they lay upon the floor of the broker's office, the plate glass windows of which were smashed in by the shock they sustained. A tremendous crowd gathered about the scene of the disaster. The safe had bored its way through sidewalk girders and into the cellar extension beneath, and left a yawning, ragged opening in its path. There was excitement to burn in the locality. The windows above and around and across the street were peopled with startled faces, few of whom had actually seen the accident, but had been aroused by the crash. While this was going on Jack picked himself up and assisted the terrified old gentleman to his feet. The stranger, a very respectable looking man of nearly seventy years of age, was as white as a ghost and trembled like an aspen leaf.

"Wha—what has happened?" he gasped, faintly.

"A safe fell from the ninth floor of this building, and you were right under it until I dashed you out of the way," replied Jack, in unsteady tones, for now that the crisis was over the reaction was beginning to tell on him.

The clerks of the office, and the broker himself, who happened to be in, now gathered about the pair and offered to assist them.

"Please bring a glass of water for this old gentleman," said Jack, "and a chair also. He can hardly stand up."

The chair and the water were speedily brought, while a crowd of curious people stood just outside the door and windows and gazed in at them.

"I believe you have saved my life, my lad," said the old gentleman at length, when he had become more composed.

"I won't say I haven't, sir," replied Jack. "I am very glad indeed I was able to do something for you. It would have been terrible had you been killed. Why, my blood turned cold when I saw you come out of the entrance of this building and stop right under that safe after the ropes had snapped and it was toppling over on the point of falling."

At this point a gentleman pushed his way through the crowd at the doorway and entered the office. He stepped right up to the old gentleman as if he knew him.

"You had a very narrow escape, Mr. Richardson, and you owe your life to this brave boy. I saw the whole occurrence. It was the nerviest act I ever saw or heard tell of. Allow me to shake you by the hand, young man. I consider it an honor to do so. I should like to know your name. If I am not mistaken you work in this neighborhood and I have seen you before."

"My name is Jack Holland. I am messenger for Howard Golding, No. — Wall Street."

"Write that down for me, Mr. Church," said old Mr. Richardson, eagerly.

The gentleman took a card from his pocket, did so and handed the card to the rescued man.

Two police officers and a reporter for a morning daily now came into the office, and Jack found that he would not be permitted to escape yet a while.

The officers questioned him and made notes in their books, and the reporter talked with him and made shorthand notes in his book. Then they turned their attention to the old gentleman, and while they were engaged with him Jack took advantage of his chance and made a break for the doorway. The crowd parted respectfully to let him pass, and they looked at him as if he was the President of the United States on a tour of Wall Street.

He got clear of the people at last, skipped across Broad street and entered Exchange Place. Hastening into the Vanderpool Building, he took an elevator for the fifth floor, reached Bullock & Co., and delivered his message.

CHAPTER V.—The Masonic Charm.

Nobody in Bullock's office had heard about the accident, and Jack didn't care to enlighten them. He waited till Mr. Bullock gave him an answer to the note, and then he started back for his own office. As he was stepping up on the sidewalk in front of the bank the glitter of the sunshine on something bright attracted the boy's attention. He stooped down and picked up a magnificent Masonic watch-charm, encrusted with diamonds.

"My stars! This is a handsome ornament," he exclaimed, "I wonder who it belongs to? I'll bet somebody is cursing his unlucky star for losing this thing."

What Jack assumed to be the owner's initials were engraved on the inside of the charm, but they didn't throw much light on the subject.

"It must be worth two or three hundred dollars," he thought. "I'll show it to Mr. Golding. Perhaps he might know the owner."

His employer wasn't in when he got back to the office, so he went into the stenographer's den and showed it to Miss Lingard.

"Isn't that just lovely!" she exclaimed. "Did you find that?"

"That's what I did, Dickie."

"Where, for goodness sake?"

"Not far from the Stock Exchange."

"What are you going to do with it? Wear it yourself?"

"Why should I wear it? I'm not a Mason. I'm going to try to find the owner."

"How do you expect to do that?"

"If I can't find out any other way I'll advertise it."

"You ought to get a reward for returning it. It looks to be very valuable," said the girl, examining the jewel carefully.

"Well, Dickie, I shouldn't refuse a small compensation, as I'm not very flush these days."

"You boys never seen to have a cent."

"What would you expect me to have on $8 per, with my board, lodging, clothes and other incidentals to come out of it? I think I'm doing pretty well to keep out of debt. Never mind, I'm going to be rich some day."

"You say that very nicely, Jack," laughed the girl.

"Sure I do. Don't you believe it?"

"I believe everything you say, Jack," replied Dickie, with a roguish glance.

"You do like fun. I'll tell you what—Excuse me, there's somebody just come into the outside room," and Jack hurried out of the counting-room.

It was Mr. Golding. The boy followed him into his private office.

"I found this charm on the street opposite the Morgan Bank," said Jack, exhibiting his find. "Do you recognize the initials on the back, sir?"

"Why, that's George Sangree's Masonic charm," replied the broker in some surprise.

"I guess you're right. The initials are G. E. S."

"I know I am right. Every broker on the floor knows that charm by sight. He says it's worth $900."

"Gee whiz! That's a lot of money to put into an ornament."

"He can afford to put $9,000 into such a thing if he wanted to. He's said to be worth half a million."

"May I carry it over to his office, sir?"

"Certainly. He ought to give you $100 for fetching that back to him."

"I wouldn't kick if he did; but I'll be satisfied if he gives me $10. It ought to be worth that to him."

"Oh, he'll give you more than $10. He thinks a good deal of that charm. I'll bet a hat he's all broke up over his loss."

Jack put on his hat and ran over to Mr. Sangree's office, which was on the other side of Wall Street.

"Mr. Sangree in?" he asked the office boy.

"What do you want to see him about? Got a message?"

"Never you mind, sonny. Just run in and tell him I want to see him on important business."

"Who are you, anyway?"

"My name is Holland. Sorry I haven't a card, but I guess you can remember it long enough to carry it into the private office."

The boy gave him a sour look and went into his employer's sanctum. Presently he came back.

"Mr. Sangree wants to know the nature of your business."

"All right. Ask him if he lost a Masonic watch-charm."

The boy carried the message inside and came back, followed by the broker.

"Did you find a Masonic watch-charm?" he asked Jack, in some excitement.

"I did."

"Let me see it."

Jack took it out of his pocket.

"That's mine," he said, in a tone of intense relief. "I lost it after I left the Exchange less than an hour ago. Where did you find it?"

"On the edge of the gutter opposite Morgan's Bank."

"By Jove! I'm glad you found it. How did you guess it belonged to me?"

"My employer, Mr. Golding, told me that he had seen it on you."

"I was going to advertise for it and offer you $200 reward for its return. You are entitled to that, my young friend. Just step into my office."

"I don't ask you to give me so much as that, sir. In fact, I have no right to expect anything. It was my duty to return it to you as soon as I found out that you were its owner."

"That's all right; but most persons wouldn't look at the matter with such honest eyes as yours. Sit down. On second thought I'll make it $300. What did you say your name was?"

"Jack Holland."

Mr. Sangree immediately drew his check for $300 and handed it to the boy.

"I am very much obliged to you, sir," said Jack.

"But I don't think I'm entitled to such a large sum."

"Don't let that worry you, Holland. That charm cost me $900, and I wouldn't lose it for good for twice $900. You have done me a great favor, and I won't forget it. Good-day."

With this check in his pocket Jack returned to Mr. Golding's office.

CHAPTER VI.—Jack's First Venture in Stocks.

The late edition of the afternoon papers had the story of the safe accident on Broad street, and Jack Holland was rated as a hero of the first magnitude. On their way to the Broadway car Dick and his chum as usual bought their evening papers. Dick was the first to notice the account of the affair printed under a big scare head.

"Howling dervishes!" exclaimed Dick, suddenly, as his bulging eyes read the words that detailed the thrilling rescue of old Mr. Lee Richardson, a retired stock-broker, by Jack Holland, a messenger employed by Howard Golding, No. — Wall Street. "What does this mean?"

"What's the matter?" grinned Jack, who easily understood the cause of his chum's astonishment.

"Say, is this you, or am I dreaming?"

Jack chuckled.

"Did you actually save that old gentleman from being mashed into a pulp by that safe?"

"I guess I did," admitted his friend.

Dick saw that Jack didn't want to discuss the affair further, so he said no more and contented himself by finishing the story in the paper. He certainly could not help admiring the nerve his friend had exhibited in such a desperate emergency. He knew that he never could have done such a thing himself. By the time they reached their boarding-house several of Mrs. Blake's boarders had read the story. After he and Dick got back to their room, Jack told his chum about the Masonic charm he had found in the gutter in front of Morgan's Bank.

"It belonged to George Sangree, the broker, and I returned it to him."

"How did you find out that it was his property?" asked Dick.

"Mr. Golding recognized it."

"Did he give you anything for recovering it?"

"Yes. He gave me this check," replied Jack, exhibiting it.

"Three hundred dollars!" exclaimed his friend. "Gee whiz!"

"Mr. Sangree said the charm is worth $900, and that he wouldn't have lost it for good for twice that amount."

"You're lucky. What are you going to do with all that money?"

"Well, I'll tell you. I'm going to soak it right into fifty shares of D. & E."

"You are?"

"I am. I heard yesterday that D. & E. is going to advance, and so I've decided to take a shy at it. It closed to-day at 57 7-8. Let us call it 58. Fifty shares on a ten per cent. margin will call for $290. If it goes up a couple of points I'll clear $100."

"And suppose it goes the other way?"

"I'm not supposing any such thing."

"But it is just as likely to go back two or three points as it is to advance."

"I don't think so. At any rate, I'm going to take the risk."

"You wouldn't catch me putting $290 up on stocks. I'm no chump."

"Then you think I'm a chump, do you?"

"I think you're foolish. Three hundred dollars is a lot of money. If I had it I'd hold on to it with a double copper-fastened grip."

"Nothing ventured nothing gained, Dickie."

"Ho! That's the principle that brings so many lambs to the Wall Street slaughter-house."

"Well, I'm willing to be a lamb for once at any rate," Jack remarked laughingly.

"I hope you won't lose your fleece, old fellow," grinned Dick; "but I have my doubts about it."

"As long as it isn't your fleece, don't worry."

Of course by next morning every broker in the district had read about the safe incident, and perhaps fifty of them found some excuse to call at Howard Golding's office in order to catch a look at the boy who had shown such courage. Several of these brokers knew Jack either personally or by sight, and they shook hands with him and said very nice things to him. Mr. Golding was also buttonholed a hundred times that day and congratulated on having such a boy in his employ.

"Why, Jack," he said, when he returned from the Exchange, "you have made yourself quite a conspicuous personage in Wall Street. Everybody seems to be talking about you to-day."

"That's what a fellow is up against when he gets his name in the newspapers," replied Jack.

"One of the penalties of fame," smiled the broker.

"Well, sir, I have one satisfaction. People will forget all about me and the safe affair in a day or two."

When Jack returned to the reception-room he found a gentleman waiting there to see him. It was Mr. Lawrence Richardson, the son of the old gentleman whose life he had saved the day previous. Mr. Richardson was a well-known broker whose office was in the New York Building. He not only expressed gratitude to the boy in feeling terms, but he presented him with an elegant gold watch and chain as an evidence of his appreciation of the priceless service Jack had rendered him and his family.

"Neither father nor I will ever forget what you have done for us," he said, as he prepared to take his departure. "Now you must call and see us at our home. We live at No. — Madison avenue. When shall we look for you? Can you call Sunday and take dinner with us?"

Jack said he would be happy to do so.

"Very well. We shall expect to see you on Sunday at three. My father is suffering from the shock to his system to-day, but I guess he'll be all right in a day or so."

With these words Mr. Richardson shook hands with Jack and went away. The boy then asked Mr. Golding if he could go out on a little business matter of his own which would not take him long, and having obtained permission to do so, he ran around to a little bank in Nassau street that made a specialty of buying and selling stocks for its customers and others, and asked the margin clerk to buy for him fifty shares of D. & E. at 58, the ruling price, putting up his $300 check and receiving $10 back.

Jack, now having a personal interest in the stock market, watched the office ticker with more interest than he ever did before. He experienced a spasm of joy when he noticed that D. & E. had gone up half a point.

"That's $25 I've made already."

He forgot, however, that had he tried to realize at that moment on his deal the bank's commission would have cut that amount exactly in half.

"It did not matter, though, as he had no thought of closing out so soon. The stock went up to 60 that afternoon, and Jack was proportionately delighted.

"What have you got to say about my investment now?" he asked Dick, as they were on their way uptown. "My stock has advanced two points since I bought it."

"So you really did make the purchase, Jack?"

"Sure I did. Did you suppose I was giving you hot air last night?"

"No, I don't say that. So D. & E. has gone up two points?"

"It has."

"It may slip back to-morrow."

"I'm not worrying."

D. & E., however, did not slip back next day, but on the contrary advanced to 61. Next day was Sunday, and Jack kept the engagement he had made to dine with the Richardsons. He was very kindly received, Mrs. Richardson, the old gentleman's daughter-in-law, expressing her own gratitude to Jack in no uncertain terms. He was also introduced to Miss Daisy Richardson, a charming little maiden of fifteen, who seemed to take a great fancy to him at once. Jack was much impressed by her beauty and vivaciousness, and on the whole considered her the nicest girl he had ever met. He stayed until nearly ten o'clock that evening, and when he took his leave both Mrs. Richardson and Daisy invited him to call soon again, which he promised to do. Next day D. & E. went to 63, and Jack felt pretty good over the prospects of making quite a profit on his first venture.

Business was pretty brisk at the office next day, and Jack only got an occasional peep at the indicator. He found that D. & E. showed no signs of a relapse. The fact that the general tone of the market was buoyant also encouraged him to hold on, for a while longer. D. & E. closed at 64 3-4 that afternoon. Next day the entire market advanced under heavy buying and D. & E. went up three points. Things were steady on the following day, but on Friday D. & E. advanced to 70.

"I guess I'll sell out," Jack said to himself Saturday morning. "I never expected this stock to go so high. I don't think I can afford to be hog-gish. In reaching after the earth I am likely to fall into the soup."

Having decided to sell, he took the first chance he got to run around to the little Nassau street bank and order his holdings closed out. He received a statement on Monday showing that his profits on the deal amounted to $587. His first plunge in the market was therefore perfectly satisfactory.

CHAPTER VII.—Mrs. Blake's New Boarders.

One day not long after Jack realized on his D. & E. venture he accidentally overheard a couple of well-known brokers talking about a pool that was being formed to boom a certain stock that had not been greatly in demand for many months. Since his entrance into Wall Street Jack had heard a good deal about maneuvers of brokers at times to corner some stock and force a rise in its price for the purpose of unloading their holdings at a large profit. He had come to look upon these sort of things as pretty risky ventures, even when the promoters were backed by large capital. He knew, however, that a successful pool often earned millions for its members. It was rare for an outsider to get next to the purposes of such a combination; therefore Jack felt that he had got hold of a good thing. The stock this particular pool had selected to boost was C. & O., then selling at 72. He met Dick that day at a lunch counter.

"How would you like to make a few dollars, chappie?" he said to his friend.

"Well, say, if you know where I can make any just let me know, will you?"

"I'm going to put my boodle in C. & O., which is ruling at 72. If you can raise $36 you can go in on five shares. I'm going to buy 120."

"What do you know about C. & O.?" asked Dick.

"I know it's going to go up soon."

"How do you know that?"

"I can't tell you that, Dick, for it's one of my secrets. But if you will hand me $36 of your good money I feel reasonably sure of doubling it for you in a short time."

Dick considered the matter for a while, and finally decided to risk that amount, which represented more than half of his savings. Accordingly Jack that afternoon bought 125 shares of C. & O., at the little bank on Nassau street, putting up $900. Several days elapsed before there was any decided movement for the better in the stock in which the two boys were interested, then it began to go up an eighth of a point at a time. At the end of ten days it was selling at 80 and was attracting considerable attention on the floor of the Exchange. Dick was as tickled as a child over a new toy. Jack, however, took things more coolly. Next day the excitement in connection with the boom in C. & O. increased. There was such a demand for the stock that it rose steadily to 96, at which point Jack notified the bank to sell. Everything pointed to the shares going to par, but the boy thought he wouldn't risk it any further, especially as he knew it would be a great disappointment to Dick if the stock got on the toboggan before they got out from under. Dick felt like standing on his head for very joy when Jack told him he had sold their shares.

"I'll get nearly $120 out of it, won't I?" he said, gleefully.

"That's what you will."

"Gee! But you'll make a pile!"

"My profit ought to be something like $2,840."

"How much will you be worth altogether then?"

"How much? About $3,700."

"Jumping alligators! And a few weeks ago you hardly had a cent to your name."

"That isn't any lie, Dick. Finding that Masonic watch-charm has put me on Easy street."

It was about this time that Mrs. Blake got two new boarders. They introduced themselves as William Higgins and Edward Moreland. Higgins wore a full beard, cropped close, while Moreland sported only a mustache. They took the front square room on the same floor with Jack and Dick. They were also assigned to seats at the table next to the boys. Moreland was a bright, entertaining young man of perhaps thirty, while Higgins was rather taciturn, with an unpleasant eye, and his age was about forty.

"What do you think of the new boarders, Dick?" asked Jack one night.

"I don't take much stock in Mr. Higgins—I don't like his face; but Moreland seems to be all to the good. He can tell a first-class story."

"That's right. He's mighty entertaining. I wonder what they do for a living?"

"You've got me. They seem to have plenty of money. I saw Higgins pull out of his pocket a wad as big as a baseball."

While the boys were talking a knock came at their door.

"Come in," said Jack.

The door opened and Edward Moreland stood on the threshold.

"I beg your pardon, my dear fellows. I hope I don't disturb you."

"Not at all," replied Dick. "Walk in."

"Thanks. I merely called to see if you had a match."

"We've loads of matches. Help yourself to as many as you want. You'll find them in that safe on the wall yonder."

"By the way, what business are you in?"

"We both work in Wall Street."

"Ah, indeed," replied Moreland, with a look of interest in his eyes. "Clerks, I suppose."

"No, sir. Messengers. I'm with Howard Golding, and my chum works for Fletcher & Co."

A slight look of disappointment appeared in their visitor's eyes.

"Jack is almost the whole thing down at his office," grinned Dick.

"How is that?"

"He carries the office key, bosses the typewriter and looks it over the clerks. I shouldn't be surprised if he carried the combination of the safe in his brains."

"Don't you believe any such rot as that," said Jack. "I carry the office key, but that's about all. Mr. Golding has a great deal of confidence in me, which I try to deserve, but messenger boys are not usually entrusted with the combination of the office safe."

"Well, hardly," laughed their visitor. "I suppose," he added carelessly, "that Golding buys railroad bonds and other securities?"

"Yes, sir."

"Mr. Higgins has just received a number of gilt-edge securities as his share of his sister's estate, which was recently settled up. I believe he is thinking of turning them into cash. He has some idea of embarking in business in this city. I shall recommend him to call on your employer. Perhaps you could make a little commission if you introduced him to Mr. Golding. I dare say Higgins would be glad to put a few dollars in your way."

"No," replied Jack. "I wouldn't look for any commission in such a transaction. If Mr. Higgins will come down to our office I'll introduce him to Mr. Golding. He will find my boss a perfect gentleman to deal with."

"I'll tell Higgins," said Moreland, putting up his pipe and rising from his chair. "He'll be much obliged to you. Thanks for the matches."

"You're welcome," replied Jack, as their visitor walked out of the room.

CHAPTER VIII.—The C. R. I. & P. R. R. Shares.

On the following evening Edward Moreland knocked on the door of the boys' room, and, being told to come in, entered, accompanied by his room-mate, William Higgins.

"We have taken the liberty of intruding upon you for a few minutes," said Moreland, with one of his engaging smiles.

"Don't mention it," replied Dick, pleasantly. "Help yourselves to chairs. Nothing like being sociable, you know."

"Thank you," answered Moreland, with a hearty geniality that was so taking in him, while Higgins bowed without a smile and pulled a chair up for himself.

Neither of the boys cared much for the society of the elder man, but ordinary politeness, together with their liking for his companion, caused them to extend to him the hospitality of their apartment.

"I told you last evening that Mr. Higgins has some bonds to dispose of," said Moreland, in an off-hand way, looking at Jack.

"That's right," admitted Holland.

"You kindly offered to introduce him to Mr. Golding."

"I will do so if he calls at our office and I am in at the time."

"So I told Mr. Higgins, and he feels greatly obliged to you for your offer."

"I shan't forget it, young man," interposed Higgins, with the nearest approach to a smile the boys had yet seen on his countenance. "Moreland and I are both strangers in this city, and it is sometimes well to have a friend at court, as folks call it. These securities, which I have brought with me to show you, came to me by the will of my sister. I am going to sell them, as I want the money to invest in business. I intended to go to your office to-morrow morning and offer them to Mr. Golding. I find I cannot do this because I have just received a telegram calling me to Philadelphia on very important business. I will, therefore, intrust to you these securities to land to your employer. Tell him I will call for the market value of the bonds, less his commission, of course, some time in the afternoon. Probably not much before four o'clock. This will give him time to verify the genuineness of the securities. I shall want the money in gold, as I have to use it in that shape."

Mr. Higgins produced a huge oblong envelope from his pocket, and took therefrom ten $1,000 bonds of the C. R. I. & P. gen. 5's, and handed them to Jack.

"I will merely ask you to sign that memorandum receipt, designating the numbers of the bonds, showing that you have received them from me," added Higgins, giving the paper to him.

Before signing the receipt Jack looked the bonds carefully over, and so far as his inexperienced judgment could determine, the bonds appeared to be all right.

"Thank you, young man," said Higgins, as he took and pocketed the receipt. "Don't forget to mention to Mr. Golding that I want the money in gold. I shall, of course, have to depend on you to identify me when I call for the cash."

"That will be all right," replied Jack.

"As you are doing me a great favor in this matter I shall make it all right with you," said Higgins.

"If you mean by that that you intend to pay me in any way I hope you will forget it," answered Jack.

"But I shouldn't be satisfied unless——"

"I am always glad to accommodate a person I know, Mr. Higgins," interrupted Jack. "So long as the person appreciates the favor that is all that is necessary."

"Higgins certainly appreciates your kindness," interposed Moreland at this point. "I will guarantee that. He doesn't purpose to offend you by offering you pay, but it is possible he might make you a small present—something that would indicate his appreciation. You understand what I mean," and the young man smiled meaningly.

"All right," replied Jack, with a grin. "I see what you are driving at."

In a few minutes the two gentlemen took their departure.

"It seems to me Mr. Higgins has a great deal of confidence in your honesty," remarked Dick, when the boys were alone once more. "What do you suppose those bonds are worth?"

"I'll tell you in a moment," answered Jack, diving into his pocket and bringing forth a printed paper giving the quotations of all stocks and bonds which had changed hands that day.

He looked down the bond list, arranged in alphabetical order, until he came to a spot on which he rested his finger.

"There was one sale to-day of ten $100 C. R. I. & P. gen. 4's at 102 1-2. The face value of these bonds are $1,000 each. Their market value is consequently $1,025.

"And you have ten of them?"

"Exactly. Total value, $10,250."

"How can Higgins tell but that would be a great temptation to you? What guarantee has he that you might not sell the bonds yourself and skip with the proceeds?"

"It would not be easy for me to do that, even were I built that way. I would have to show how I came by the bonds before I could dispose of them. Mr. Higgins is safe enough in leaving them in my hands. But to tell the truth, Dick, I don't like the responsibility. Suppose I should lose these securities before I reached the office, where would I be at?"

"If you used ordinary care you could not be held responsible, as Mr. Higgins voluntarily intrusted them to you for his own benefit, not for yours. You did not ask him to let you carry the bonds to your boss."

"Well, I don't see what he wanted me to take them down at all for."

"Wants to save time, I suppose. He's going to Philadelphia in the morning, and will be back in time to go to your office to get the money. That's the way I understand the matter."

"I suppose it's all right; but it looks kind of funny to me," said Jack, thoughtfully.

The boys didn't go out that evening, and when they retired Jack took the precaution to place the envelope containing the bonds between the mattress and the springs of the bed. When Jack and Dick left the house in the morning to go to business, Edward Moreland, who was standing by the gate, joined them and walked up toward Broadway with them. He said he was going to Staten Island on business and took the same car downtown.

As the boys started to leave the car at Wall Street, he accompanied them, saying he recollected that he had a call to make in Pearl street. All three walked down Wall street together, until they came to the entrance of the building where Jack worked.

"This is where you hang out, eh?" remarked Moreland, looking up at the building. "What floor?"

"Second in front," answered Jack.

"When do you get off?"

"About five o'clock these days."

"You said you locked up, didn't you?"

"Yes; but I wish somebody else had that cheerful duty."

"Well, you want to be sure and have that money ready for Higgins when he calls after he gets back from Philadelphia."

"If the bonds are all right the cashier will have the money ready."

"I'm satisfied the bonds are all right," nodded Moreland in a positive way. "I wish I owned a few as good ones myself. Well, good-by. I'll see you to-night."

They shook hands and Jack rushed upstairs to open the office in readiness for the clerks.

CHAPTER IX.—A Tip on A. & P.

As soon as Mr. Golding appeared at the office Jack took the envelope containing the ten C. R. I. & P. R. R. bonds in to him, and explained that they belonged to Mrs. Blake's new boarder, William Higgins, who wished to exchange them for their value in gold coin.

"To what extent are you acquainted with this William Higgins, Jack?" asked the broker.

"Well, sir, to tell the honest truth, I know nothing whatever about him except that he has been boarding at our house about a week."

"Did he mention how he came by these bonds, and give any reason for wanting to sell them?"

"He said his sister left them to him by will, and his reason for disposing of them is that he needs the money to invest in some business the nature of which he didn't state."

"He told you that, did he?"

"Yes, sir."

"Why does he want the money all in gold?"

"He didn't say."

"Why did he send these bonds to me by you instead of bringing them himself? Rather an odd way of doing business, don't you think?"

"He said that he had to go to Philadelphia this morning on urgent business, and he wanted the money in a hurry, and knew you would have to verify them before buying, so he thought he could save time by sending them by me. He will call for the money himself this afternoon when he gets back to this city, which will be about four o'clock."

Mr. Golding did not look thoroughly satisfied with this explanation. However, he said he would look into the securities, and if he felt reasonably assured of their genuineness he would probably buy them. Soon after that he sent the boy with a message to the Mills Building. Jack took the elevator to the sixth floor, and thence made his way down the corridor toward the office of a well-known broker. Here he delivered his message, and there being no answer, he hastened back to the elevator again. As he came in sight of it the cage had just stopped at the floor, going down, and a stout, well-dressed gentleman was boarding it. The gentleman put his hand to his hip pocket and drew out his handkerchief as he stepped in. Jack, who made a wild dash to catch the cage, saw something fall out of his pocket onto the marble floor.

The elevator man ignored the boy, slammed the door shut, and in another moment the cage vanished downward out of sight.

"He might just as well have waited for me as not," breathed Jack, very much annoyed, as he slid up to the iron framework surrounding the elevator. Then he noticed a folded piece of paper on the floor at his feet.

"That must be what that gentleman pulled out of his pocket with his handkerchief," he said, looking down and picking it up.

It looked like a note of some kind, and as there was no address on it, Jack hesitated whether he ought to open it or not on the chance of the owner's name and address being on the inside, in which event, if the note seemed to be of any value, he could return it to him. Finally he decided to look into it while waiting for the next cage to come down. The note was headed with a date, beneath which was the following:

"O. G. S.:

"The consolidation is now an assured fact, and will be publicly announced in forty-eight hours. Put every cent you can beg, borrow or—steal, I was going to say, but you know what I mean—in A. & P., which is now ruling at 68, but which I assure you will be among the clouds in a week or ten days. All of us on the inside will make a barrel of money out of the rise. It is an Al copper-fastened cinch for us wise guys, and don't make any mistake about it, Yours, T. R."

Jack was so interested in the contents of the foregoing note that he permitted the next descending cage to pass on down without signaling it. He read it over a second time before the truth dawned upon him that he had actually got hold of a pointer that was worth having.

Jack signaled the descending elevator, caught it and was presently in the street once more. But his head was chock full of the prospects of making a big haul out of A. & P. as he hurried back to the office. The more he thought over the situation the more resolved he grew to risking the money he had already made in the market by going the whole hog in A. & P. That afternoon he investigated in a quiet way the latest known developments in A. & P., and from what he learned in various quarters, when taken in connection with the contents of the note he had picked up, he felt assured that he could afford to take the chances. Jack, for reasons which he deemed good and sufficient, had not deposited his $3,700 in the savings bank, but had put it into a small tin box which he had placed in the office safe. About half-past two o'clock he went to Mr. Day, the cashier, and asked him for the box. It was immediately handed to him. Jack took it aside, unlocked it and helped himself to $3,400. He had calculated that this was the amount he would have to put up on 500 shares of A. & P. at 68 on a margin of ten per cent. Having received permission to absent himself from the office for a few minutes, he ran around to the little Nassau street bank and purchased the shares.

"Now I'm in it for fair, sink or swim," he said to himself as he walked out of the bank with the memorandum of the transaction in his pocket.

When he got back to the office Mr. Golding called him into his private room and told him that he had decided not to purchase the C. R. I. & P. bonds until he had an interview with Mr. Higgins himself.

"Tell him, when he comes here this afternoon for the money, that I will see him in the morning any time between half-past nine and ten if he will call."

"All right, sir."

Mr. Golding then put on his hat and overcoat and went home. At four o'clock Jack was surprised to see Edward Moreland walk into the reception-room.

"Didn't expect to see me, did you?" he said, laughingly.

"No," replied the boy. "You're about the last person I would have looked for."

"Well, it's the unexpected that always happens, you know."

"That's right."

"I didn't drop in simply to make you a call, Holland," Moreland went on, his eyes taking in every detail of the office; "but to tell you that I received the telegram from Higgins stating that he would be obliged to take a later train, and that he will not be able to reach this office before half-past five. He told me to ask you to wait for him with the money."

"I would do so with pleasure if it merely depended on me, Mr. Holland; but Mr. Golding has directed me to say that he wants to see Mr. Higgins himself personally before he will buy the bonds."

A look of vexation came over Edward Moreland's face at this intelligence, and he said, in a tone unusually disagreeable for him:

"Then Mr. Golding did not procure the gold to pay for the bonds?"

"I don't think so," replied Jack, rather surprised at the unusual interest Moreland seemed to take in his companion's affairs.

"Higgins will be greatly disappointed," went on the young man, with a frown.

"I am very sorry," answered Jack, "but it is no fault of mine."

"I suppose not," interjected Moreland, glancing through the cashier's window at Mr. Day, who was counting a tray of $20 gold pieces, something like $12,000, which had been delivered in an express package a few moments before, and which had to be kept in the office overnight, as it was after banking hours. The young man's eyes glistened strangely, perhaps avariciously, as he saw the gold and heard the musical clink of the coin.

"I will remain here till Mr. Higgins arrives and explains the situation to him," said Jack.

Moreland made no reply, but seemed to be studying the region behind the brass fence which shut off the counting-room. Finally he turned around abruptly.

"What did you say?" he asked the boy.

Jack repeated the remark.

"Do so," answered Moreland. "He certainly wouldn't like it if he came here and found the office shut up."

With these words he nodded shortly and left the room with a quick step.

CHAPTER X.—The Unmasking of William Higgins and Edward Moreland.

It was rather five when a cab stopped in front of the building where Mr. Golding had his offices. Mr. William Higgins got out with a good-sized satchel in his hand, mounted the stairs to the second floor and entered Golding's outer office. The janitor's assistant was sweeping the room. Higgins looked around for Jack Holland and spied him seated behind the brass fence reading an afternoon newspaper. He put down the satchel on a chair just as the boy, who had been on the lookout for him, noticed that he had arrived. Jack came out at once to meet him.

"I am sorry, Mr. Higgins, that the money is not ready for you, but——"

"I understand. I met Moreland and he told me that Mr. Golding wants to see me personally before he concludes the transaction."

Jack was both surprised and pleased to see that Mr. Higgins took the matter in such a good-natured way. He was prepared for a somewhat unpleasant interview, instead of which the man showed not the least symptom of annoyance.

"Mr. Golding will expect to see you between half past nine and ten in the morning."

"All right," responded Higgins. "I find that a day or two will not make any difference with me now."

"I was afraid you would find some fault with me; but I assure you——"

"Don't say a word," replied Mr. Higgins in an unusually cheerful tone. "Why should I blame you? You have done all I asked you to do. On the whole it is much better as it is, for I shouldn't care to take the money away with me at this hour as matters stand. If the money was ready for me I should allow it to remain in your safe till morning. I suppose Mr. Golding is often obliged to keep considerable money in his safe overnight?"

"Not often, sir. This afternoon, however, we received an express package——"

Jack suddenly became conscious that he was saying too much and he stopped abruptly.

"Yes, yes, I understand. Out-of-town customer, I suppose. Package came too late for its contents to be sent to the bank. Such things will happen occasionally, you know," he rattled on in an off-hand way. "Well, Holland, I am extremely obliged to you for staying here on my account. I shan't forget it."

"Don't mention it, Mr. Higgins. Glad to oblige you."

"I shouldn't have come here after I met Moreland, only I knew you would be waiting for me to show up. So I took a cab and came around. Now it will be almost too late for us to get to Twenty-third street in time for dinner, so I shall insist that you dine with me at the Astor House."

Mr. Higgins clapped the boy familiarly on the shoulder and started toward the door without paying any attention to the satchel he had brought with him.

"I'm much obliged to you, Mr. Higgins, for the invitation, but I guess I can get to the house in time for dinner," replied Jack, as they walked out into the corridor.

"Well, I want you to dine with me, anyway. I've kept you down here long past your time, so it's only fair I should make some amends. Come, now, I'll take no refusal."

"All right, Mr. Higgins, have it your own way."

Mr. Higgins linked his arm in the boy's and they walked down the stairs together as if they were old friends. He led Jack to the cab, and opening the door said:

"Jump in."

Jack did so. Mr. Higgins following after telling the driver to take them to the Astor House, and the vehicle started for Broadway at a good pace. It was seven o'clock and quite dark by the time they finished their meal and stepped out on Broadway again. They started up the thoroughfare together in a leisurely way on foot, and had got opposite City Hall when a man, who had been on the lookout for them, came out of a doorway and walked toward them.

"Why, hello, Moreland, what are you doing down here at this hour?" asked Higgins as if the meeting was entirely accidental instead of as it really was, a prearranged affair.

"I went over to Jersey City after meeting you on a little matter of business, got my dinner over there, and have only just got back," answered Moreland.

"All right. We'll take the next car uptown."

When a car came along they jumped on board and sat down. Higgins and his roommate got talking on various subjects till they had passed Canal street, when Moreland suddenly remarked:

"Why, what did you do with that satchel you had with you at the ferry? You said you were going to take it to the house, as——"

"By George!" exclaimed Higgins in apparent excitement. "I must have left it at the Astor House. No, I didn't. I remember I had it in my hand when I went into your office, Holland. I recollect I laid it down on a chair just as you came out from behind the brass screen to talk to me. You didn't see it in my hand when we came out, did you?"

"No," replied Jack.

"Then it's there now. I must have it, for it contains things I have to make use of to-night. You can get into your office at any time, can't you, Holland?"

"Yes," answered Jack, rather reluctantly, for he didn't relish the idea of having to return to Wall Street that evening.

"It's too bad, but I'll have to impose on your good nature so far as to ask you to go back with me, so that I can recover my package. I don't see how I could have been so careless."

"Must you really have it to-night?" asked the boy.

"I positively must."

"All right. I'll go back with you."

"I know it's a shame to ask you," said Higgins; "but——"

"That's all right," replied Jack, good-naturedly, walking unconsciously into the trap these men had spread to catch him.

Higgins and Moreland exchanged glances of satisfaction as all three rose from their seats and the car was stopped for them to alight. They took the next car bound for the Battery, and the clock on Trinity steeple was striking eight when they got out at Wall street.

A few minutes later they ascended the deserted stairway leading to Mr. Golding's office. The night watchman in the corridor below had looked hard at them, but being well acquainted with Holland, to whom he nodded, he made no remark on their presence there at that hour. Jack unlocked the office door and stepped forward to turn on the electric light when Higgins said:

"Never mind lighting up. I know just where I left that satchel," and he made a step forward. Moreland was the last to enter, and as he did so he deftly snatched the key out of the lock, closed the door softly and locked it from the inside. He conveyed the fact to Higgins by some preconcerted signal, and the bearded man suddenly turned upon Jack and said sharply:

"Do you know how much gold there was in that Adams Exchange package that was left here this afternoon after banking hours?"

The question nearly paralyzed the boy, who stared at the speaker through the gloom of the office as if his ears had deceived him.

"Why don't you answer, you little monkey?" demanded Higgins, gripping Jack by the shoulder.

"Why, what do you mean, Mr. Higgins?" asked the astonished lad.

"I mean just what I said," replied Higgins, roughly.

"I don't wish to be impertinent, Mr. Higgins," said Jack, calmly; "but I fail to see what interest you can have in that package."

"That's my business. Moreland and I have made up our minds to get possession of that money, and anything else of value we can conveniently take away with us, including those bonds which you brought down here. We have simply made use of you to get into this office, and in order to keep you quiet until we are done with our business we will just take the liberty of making you our prisoner."

The two rascals, for such it was now apparent they were, thought they had an easy thing in Jack, as he was only a boy; but they made a great mistake. In an instant he realized the trap which had been sprung upon him, and he tried to think of some desperate expedient for defeating their object. As they started to lay their hands on him he sprang away from them, darted into the counting-room and made for the cashier's desk, where he knew he would find a loaded revolver. He probably would have succeeded in his object but for the activity of Moreland, who dashed after and clutched him just as he reached the desk.

"Hel——"

The cry, which Jack hoped might reach the ears of the night watchman, was stifled by a sinewy grip upon his throat, and a moment later Higgins was binding his arms with a length of soft rope he took from his pocket.

"Hold him until I can get a towel to gag him," the bearded rascal said to his associate in villainy.

This part of the business was speedily accomplished, and the two men tossed their victim down alongside of the cashier's big safe.

CHAPTER XI.—Turning the Tables.

Higgins took a folding pocket dark-lantern from his pocket, straightened it out into shape and, striking a match, lit the small lamp inside. With the aid of this light the two crooks examined the lay of the counting-room, already partially familiar to Moreland. There were two safes in the room—the big one against which Jack had been laid and a small one close to a square table fitted with drawers.

"We'll tackle the small one first and see what's in it," said Higgins, who appeared to be the leader of the enterprise.

He hurried into the reception-room and presently returned with the satchel he had left there on his first visit to the office. Unlocking it, he emptied out a collection of fine steel burglars' tools on the floor. He and Moreland lost no time putting the parts together. Then they commenced their operations on the small safe. Jack watched them with staring eyes, conscious that he was playing a very unenviable part in the little drama. If he only could get his hands free, he might be able to reach the revolver in the drawer of the cashier's desk; then he would defend his employer's property if he lost his life in the end.

The softness of the rope rather defeated his efforts, but the careless way in which Higgins had in his hurry tied him was in his favor. The greatest advantage he had, however, was the small size of his hands, which were long, thin and tapering, what people call genteel. Given time enough, Jack was certain he could free himself. The rascals were expert safe breakers, and made short work of the small one. The steel face around the lock was drilled, a fuse inserted and the door blown out with very little noise. Moreland uttered a chuckle of joy, for it was in this safe the cashier had deposited the $12,000 in gold coin which had come to the office in the express package. The young crook grabbed up the satchel, placed it on the table fitted with drawers, and, taking the tray of coin out of the safe, emptied it into the bag.

While he was doing this the bearded rascal approached their prisoner.

"This is where we get square with you, young man," cried William Higgins, stooping and shaking his red, hairy fist before Jack's face. "You ought to be thankful that we don't blow the whole top off your head."

"Well, are you ready to tackle the big safe now, Bill?" asked Moreland.

"Yes. The bonds are in there, no doubt, as well as lots of other securities which we could raise money on if we only had them. It would be a shame to go away with just the gold alone when we are not likely to get such a snap soon again."

"That's right," agreed Moreland, lighting a Turkish cigarette he took from his pocket. "I believe in lifting everything in sight."

They began to select the tools they were going to use, the most important of which was the fine, highly tempered steel drill they had employed to such advantage on the small safe. In a moment or two they began work on the large safe. Jack, though now close to them, but partially hid from their sight, recommenced his cautious struggles to free his hands from the rope. They paid no attention whatever to the boy, being satisfied that they had nothing whatever to fear from him. Ten minutes passed away in this manner, and nothing was to be heard but the deep breathing of Higgins, who was manipulating the drill, and the soft whir of the diamond-pointed instrument on the steel face of the safe door. Jack looked up at the clock and dimly saw that it was now quarter past nine. At that moment something gave way in the drill and Higgins uttered an exclamation of pain.

"What's the matter?" asked Moreland, who just then was selecting another steel tool from the bunch on the floor.

"The bit was broken, and I've nearly smashed one of my thumbs against the safe," replied Higgins, with a subdued curse.

"Well, here's another bit."

"Then tackle this job yourself while I go and put my hand under the faucet."

"Don't be long, Bill. We can't be all night over this thing," answered the younger crook, tossing his half-smoked cigarette aside and taking up his associate's work, after inserting a new bit into the drill.

It was at this moment that Jack succeeded in freeing his hands.

"Now if I can reach that drawer and secure Mr. Day's revolver I may be able to outwit these rascals," he breathed.

He waited until Higgins disappeared in the direction of the lavatory, and then cautiously removed the towel from about his mouth.

"So far so good," he thought. "Now I've got to pass Moreland before I can reach the desk. A sudden dash ought to do it, for he's busy with the drill."

Jack drew in his legs by degrees, and was pleased to note that Moreland paid no attention to his movements. Hidden by the side of the big safe and the gloom of the office, Jack slowly rose to his feet. His head reaching the level of the top of the safe, came into unexpected contact with a heavy, round ruler which had been thrown there some days previously. Putting up his hand and noting what the article was, a new plan at once suggested itself to the brave boy. He deftly took possession of the ruler, which formed a formidable weapon in the hands of a resolute person, and bracing his nerves for the effort, he suddenly dashed out behind Moreland and brought the ruler down upon him with considerable force. The darkness of the room had largely contributed to the success of his movements, the only light being the round orbit of the dark-lantern which was placed so as to shine upon the spot where the man was drilling. Moreland never uttered a sound louder than a gasp of pain, and fell to the floor insensible. Jack at once glided over to the cashier's desk, pulled out the drawer and secured the revolver.

He now felt in a position to cope even with the burly William Higgins. His idea was to creep to the door of the washroom, slam the door to before the rascal caught on to the situation, and by turning the key, which was always in the lock, make him a prisoner. This would give him the chance to communicate with the Old Slip police station by telephone and tell the officer in charge how things stood in Mr. Golding's office. While waiting for the policemen to come to take charge of the crooks he could easily keep Higgins in subjection at the point of the revolver if he attempted to force his way from the lavatory.

Besides, a shot fired in the hall would summon the night watchman to his aid if need be. But Jack preferred not to call in the watchman, as he wanted to secure all the glory of outwitting the two rascals himself. He carried out this program to the letter, and the reader may well believe that William Higgins was a pretty thoroughly surprised man when he found himself securely locked into the washroom. Jack hastened to the telephone and soon communicated the situation to the police. Then he went to the office door and found it locked, as he suspected. He unlocked it, leaving it ajar for the officers to enter. Last of all, he turned up the electric lights, and, revolver in hand, he listened with a grin of triumph to the futile efforts of the imprisoned Higgins to escape from the lavatory.

CHAPTER XII.—Jack Makes a Good Thing Out of A. & P.

The appearance of three police officers rather astonished the watchman of the building, who up to this moment had received no hint that anything was out of the ordinary run in the place. He accompanied them to Mr. Golding's office, where they were received by Jack, who pointed out the unconscious Edward Moreland, showed what damage the crooks had accomplished, and then led them to the lavatory door behind which Higgins was imprisoned.

"Whatever explanations of this affair are to be made I will make to the officer at the station," said Jack.

The lavatory door was unlocked and Higgins found himself confronted by three uniformed officers of the law. Resistance was useless, so he yielded to the inevitable. The unconscious Moreland was picked up and carried to the sidewalk, where a patrol wagon was waiting to receive the prisoners. Jack took charge of the valise containing the gold which had been in the small safe, and accompanied the party to the station, after locking up the office. He had already notified Mr. Golding and Mr. Day, the cashier, by telephone, and expected they would both be downtown before long. Jack told his story to the sergeant of the Old Slip station, the prisoners were locked up, and then the boy returned with the satchel to the office under the protection of a policeman. It wasn't long before the cashier turned up, and he was aghast at the havoc done by the two crooks. His anxiety was allayed when Jack showed him the gold in the valise and assured him that he felt sure not a dollar was missing. While they were looking at the wreck of the small safe, Mr. Golding made his appearance, and he, too, was shocked at the condition of his office. Jack then told his story all over again, down to the minutest detail, and both gentlemen praised him for the nerve he had displayed under very trying circumstances. Before Mr. Golding went home he presented his young messenger with his check for $1,000 and raised his wages to $10 per week.

Jack had to appear at the Tombs Police Court next afternoon against William Higgins and Edward Moreland, and on his evidence they were held for the grand jury. As these persons do not figure again in our story we will say right here that a true bill for burglary was found against them, they were duly tried, convicted and sent to Sing Sing prison for a long term of years, where they still are at this writing and will remain for many years yet. The ten $1,000 C. R. I. & P. bonds which figure in this case were found to have been stolen from the residence of a wealthy Montclair resident, and were upon identification returned to him. He sent Jack a check for $250 in recognition of the part he played in the matter, which had resulted in the recovery of the stolen bonds. If Dick had thought his chum something above the common after the safe affair, he now took his hat off to him as a kind of phenomenon, and he considered the honor of having Jack for his chum and roommate very great indeed. Old Lee Richardson came downtown especially to call on Jack after he read about the burglary in the morning papers, and he said some very nice things to the boy, at the same time urging him to call at their home as soon as he could find it convenient to do so. Jack was more than willing to oblige the old gentleman in this particular, as he was somewhat eager to meet Miss Daisy Richardson once more, so he promised to call on the following Sunday evening. After the Exchange closed on the day following the attempted burglary at Mr. Golding's office, the news that the A. & P. had actually gobbled up the L. G. & W. leaked out, and all Wall Street began to wonder if it was true. The next morning's papers confirmed the intelligence and then brokers began to be deluged with orders from the outside public to buy A. & P. A small riot ensued around the A. & P. standard after the Exchange opened and a score of brokers began bidding for the shares.

Nobody, however, who owned any A. & P. stock cared to sell it at the prevailing quotations, and so the brokers increased their bids, with no takers, until the shares advanced from 69, the opening price, to 80, at which figure a few shares exchanged hands. Jack, with $1,300 more at his command, was ready to add to his holdings if he could have got it at 75 or under, but he soon found that he'd have to pay a high figure or go without any additional shares, so he quit trying.

When the Exchange closed for the day he was over $7,000 to the good on his 500 bunch, which showed that A. & P. had advanced fourteen points since the previous day.

The stock opened at 83 3-8 next morning and advanced with a rush up to 90, at which point so much of the stock changed hands that the price did not go higher than 92 for the rest of the day.

Next day was Saturday and the high-water mark of A. & P. up to noon was 95.

"It's too bad we're not in this thing," said Dick, as he and Jack took a car for Twenty-third street after they had lunched.

"You mean A. & P.?"

"Sure. What else should I mean?"

"Well, I'm in it to the tune of 500 shares, if you want to know."

"Five hundred shares!" cried Dick. "When did you get them and what did you pay for them?"

"I got the shares the day Higgins and Moreland tried to clean out our office, and I paid 68 for them."

"Sixty-eight, and it is now ruling at 95. Why, you'll make a mint of money. How came you to buy that stock? It seemed to be going begging on Wednesday, and yet on Thursday morning, after the news of the consolidation had been confirmed, you could not find a share in sight."

"I wish an idea like that would strike me once in a while. I might make a haul, too. You're over $13,000 ahead at this point."

"I guess I am," replied Jack, nonchalantly.

"You take it quite coolly, Jack. If I was in your shoes I'd be clean off my nut with excitement. If you had cashed in at present figures how much would you be worth altogether now?"

"How much? Something over $18,000."

"Sizzling saucepans! I guess that gypsy didn't tell any lie when she said you were a favorite of fortune. I'll bet you'll be worth a million some day."

"I expect to, or go broke trying to get there," laughed Jack.

On the following Tuesday A. & P. reached 103, and as that gave Jack a profit of $35 a share he ordered his 500 shares sold.

After deducting commission and the interest on the money advanced by the bank to carry the deal for him for less than a week, he found he had cleared about $17,000. Taken altogether it was a lucky deal, and raised his capital to $22,000.

CHAPTER XIII.—Jack Scoops in $100,000.

Jack was now thoroughly impregnated with the speculative fever, and with the prophecy of the old gypsy that he was destined to make a barrel of money before he reached his twenty-first year ringing in his brain, he was continually on the lookout for another chance that would add to his already large winnings. He was cautious enough not to rush in blindfolded and buy any stock just because the idea struck him that it was likely to advance. In many instances he found later on that had he been so reckless he would most certainly have been badly nipped. One day a messenger boy came into Mr. Golding's office with a note addressed to Jack Holland.

"That's for me," said Jack, as he glanced at the superscription on the envelope.

"Are youse Golding's partner?"

"How much would you give to find out, sonny?" asked Jack, as he tore open the envelope.

"Not in'. Only I t'ought if yer wuz yer might give a feller a tip."

"What kind of a tip? Stocks or money?"

"I wouldn't turn up me nose at a nickel," replied the boy.

"Well, sonny, here's a dime for you."

"Youse is a gent of de fust water," grinned the messenger boy, putting the silver piece in his pocket. "May de grass be green over yer grave when yer die. So long."

The note was from Mr. Lawrence Richardson, who stated that his father was in his office and wished to see Jack on business if he could manage to call over for a few minutes. Jack took the note in to Mr. Golding, who was in his office at the time.

"You may go over, Jack; but don't stay any longer than you can help, as I shall need you in a little while."

So the boy put on his hat and hurried down Broad street to the New York Building. An elevator took him up to the sixth floor, and he was presently ushered into Mr. Richardson's private office. The Richardsons, father and son, greeted him warmly, and he was invited to sit down.

"Jack," said the old gentleman, who had now got into the habit of calling Holland by his first name, "have you got any money saved up?"

"Yes, sir," replied the boy with a grin.

He wondered what the elder Richardson would have said if he knew that he had $22,000 of good money stowed away in a safe deposit box where he could lay his hands on it at almost a moment's notice. However, as Mr. Lee Richardson didn't ask him how much money he possessed, he didn't feel called upon to say anything about the pleasant fact.

"Have you enough to take advantage of a sure tip on the market if I give it to you?" asked the old gentleman. "That is, have you two or three hundred dollars?"

"Yes, sir. I have more than that."

"Good. I would gladly lend or give you the money to help you make a little haul, but I think from what I have seen of your character that you would prefer not to be under obligations to anybody."

"That's right, sir. I want to make the million I'm after by myself alone."

"Then you really hope to be worth a million some day, eh?" replied the old gentleman with an amused smile.

"I have strong reason to believe that I'll get there in the course of time—maybe sooner than most people would imagine."

"You seem to have great confidence in yourself," laughed Lawrence Richardson, the old gentleman's son.

"Yes, sir. I think I have reason to be. I'm not eighteen yet by several months. I came to New York a year and a half ago without a cent of my own money, and now I'm worth—well, I'm worth something," Jack said, breaking off suddenly.

"Well," smiled the old gentleman, indulgently, "I'm going to put you in the way of making a small addition to your savings, but this is strictly a confidential matter between you and ourselves. You must not breathe a word to anybody on the outside, for it would defeat the plans we have formed to advance a certain stock on the market."

"I understand, sir. I'll be as dumb as an oyster about whatever you tell me."

"That's right, Jack. You see we are placing a great deal of confidence in you, and we do this in order to give you a little lift. Now, my lad, get your money out of your bank and buy D. A. & N., which is now ruling at 52, on a ten per cent. margin. You can't lose anything, and I can almost guarantee that you will clear $25 a share on every one you buy."

"Thank you, sir. I'll do as you say."

"Hold on to it until you receive a message from my son. He will tell you when to sell."

"Yes, sir."

"That is all. You had better get back to your office, as Mr. Golding may need you. Buy the stock this afternoon if you can, but do not delay longer than to-morrow, or you will lose some of the cream."

Jack thanked the old gentleman for the tip, which he guessed must be a valuable one, as he knew that Lee Richardson was a director and heavy stockholder in the D. A. & N. road, and then returned to his office.

When he went to lunch he got $20,800 out of his safe deposit box.

"I'll divide this deal among four different brokers; that is, I'll give the bank an order for 1,000 shares, and three brokerage houses a similar order. That'll be better than placing it all with one house, in case I make large winnings."

He carried out this plan and then hurried to his lunch. He met Dick on his way there.

"Anything new?" asked his chum.

"Well, I think I can put you on to a good thing if you'll guarantee to say nothing. I wouldn't make this proposition to another living soul, but you're my chum and I like to see you get on. I got a tip this morning and promised not to open my mouth about it, so you see I'm really going back on my promise by saying anything about the matter to you."

"I'll be as mute as a mopstick, Jack; you know I will," said Dick, eagerly, for he judged that if his friend had a tip it was a good one, and he was crazy for another chance to increase his little capital of $225.

"Well, I'll trust you, Dick. Buy as many shares of D. A. & N. on margin as you can raise the dust for, and do it right away."

"All right," replied Dick.

Gladland rushed off to the savings bank and got $225, which would enable him to purchase forty shares at 52. Then he went to the little Nasau street bank and put the transaction through. Two days later the shares had advanced to 55. Before the week was out D. A. & N. had attracted general attention by information which was published and confirmed that the road had leased a rival line, and thus done away with ruinous competition in passenger and freight rates which had prevented it from declaring a dividend in several years. Of course, the stock boomed at once, and brokers fell over each other in their efforts to get some of the stock. The shares advanced rapidly to 78, at which point Jack got a message from Mr. Richardson to sell at once. He lost no time in doing so, and passed the word to Dick to do the same. The boys cleared a profit of $25 a share over all expenses, Jack making $100,000 and Dick $1,000.

CHAPTER XIV.—Jack and Daisy Richardson.

Jack was now worth $122,000. It was a big lot of money for a boy of his years to call his own. The possession of such a fund almost made him discontented at the idea of working as an ordinary messenger for $10 per week. He wished he was old enough and experienced enough to branch out as a broker for himself, which was the ultimate goal of his ambition. In order to reach that goal he would have to stick to Mr. Golding, and learn all he could about Wall Street methods, and all this could not be accomplished in a month, nor even in a year. He couldn't deposit his money in a regular bank and draw checks against it, for this was against law and custom. Neither could he place more than a small part of it in the reliable savings banks, since these banks would not receive more than $3,000 from a depositor altogether, and most of them would only take that much at the rate of $500 in six months. So all he could do for the present was to place it in his safe deposit box for safe keeping. A few days after he had made his big coup in D. A. & N. he called on the Richardsons, where he had now become a steady visitor, much to the satisfaction of Miss Daisy, who had taken a great liking to the good-looking boy. Old Mr. Richardson asked him if he had sold out, as his son had told him to do.

"Yes, sir."

"Good! Then you easily cleared $25 a share on your holdings, didn't you?"

"Yes, sir. That was about the figure."

"I suppose I am correct in assuming that you made at least $1,000?"

"I made a great deal more than that, sir."

"I am delighted to know that," replied the old gentleman, in a gratified tone.

"You were very kind to give me that tip, Mr. Richardson, and I am ever so much obliged to you for doing so," said Jack.

"Don't mention it, my dear boy. You know I am under everlasting obligations to you, and that tip was only a little thing on my part to slightly repay you for your bravery that never-to-be-forgotten morning on Broad street."

"I'm going to have a party next week, and I want you to come," said Daisy Richardson, when they were alone together a little while that evening in her home.

"I shall be very glad to come, Miss Daisy. Would you permit me to bring my chum and roommate, Dick Garland, with me?" he asked.

"Certainly," she replied. "Bring him by all means."

Daisy accompanied him to the door.

"You will surely come next Thursday, won't you?" she said, as she allowed her hand to rest in his.

"I wouldn't miss coming for a farm," he laughed.

Then he said good-night, and started for a car.

"You want to get your glad rags in order for Thursday night," he said to Dick, whom he found reading a book when he returned to his boarding-house.

"Why, what's on the carpet for Thursday night?" asked Dick, curiously.

"Miss Daisy Richardson is going to have a party, and I have promised to bring you with me."

"Go on! I don't know Miss Richardson."

"That's all right. I'm going to introduce you to her."

"Better not. I might cut you out," grinned Dick.

"Oh, I'll risk that."

"Then you feel quite solid in that quarter, do you?"

"I didn't say I was."

"But I guess you think you are."

"Never mind about that. There'll be lots of pretty girls there Thursday night, and you'll be right in line to make an impression on one of them."

It didn't take much coaxing to persuade Dick to agree to accompany his friend, so Thursday evening they both got themselves up regardless, as the saying is, and went to the party. They had a fine time there, and the boys declared when they came away after midnight that they had never enjoyed themselves so much in their lives before.

CHAPTER XV.—The Game that Jack Holland Proposes to Block.

Every broker has his enemies, and Mr. Golding had his. The most persistent of these was a man named Washburn. He absolutely hated Golding, for reasons of his own, and made no secret of the matter. He had tried long and unsuccessfully to do Jack's employer up by some smart trick on the market, but as Mr. Golding was smart he had not so far succeeded in accomplishing his desires. He didn't give up hope of eventually reaching the end he aimed at, but the longer it was put off the more bitter he felt against the man he disliked. The enmity he had for Mr. Golding he also extended to Jack, though just why he included the boy, who was a great favorite in Wall Street, would have been hard for even himself to explain. It was probably his nature to act that way, and that is about all there was to it. One morning a well-known broker came to Mr. Golding's office, and Jack showed him into the private office.

"Good-morning, Golding," said the visitor, suavely.

"Good-morning, Blum. What can I do for you?"

"Have you any D. & H. stock on hand?"

"Not a share," replied Golding.

"I'm looking for some for future delivery. I'll tell you what I'll do with you, Golding. It's worth 85 to-day. I'll give you 88 for 2,000 shares at ten days."

"You must have an idea that D. & H. is going to rise soon," laughed Golding.

"I have. That's why I want to secure an option on it."

Mr. Golding looked up the previous day's quotations and saw that D. & H. had dropped from 85 3-5 to 85. He didn't care much for selling an option on so large a number of shares, but still there was a chance that the stock would go still lower in the next few days, which would enable him to buy it in for even less than 85, and give him a good profit on the transaction.

"I'll sell you an option on 10,000 shares at 88 1-2," said Golding, turning again to his visitor.

"I want 20,000 shares."

"Well, I'll give you the call on 20,000 at 90. What do you say?"

"No, you won't," replied Blum. "The most I'll give is 88 1-2."

Mr. Golding considered.

"I'll split the difference between your original offer and mine, and make it 89. That's the best I'll do."

Blum haggled over the matter, but Golding was firm.

"Well," said Blum, finally, "how much deposit do you want?"

"Five per cent. on the current value of the stock."

Blum agreed to pay that, and between them they figured the thing out.

"Twenty thousand at 85 comes to $1,700,000," said Blum. "Five per cent of that is $85,000. You write the option while I draw my check for the amount of deposit."

It was soon done, and Broker Blum left the office with Golding's ten-day option in his pocket.

That morning Jack had been sent to a Brooklyn bonded warehouse on an errand, and was returning on a ferryboat. Curiosity to see the engine-room had taken him into the center of the boat, but much to his disappointment he had found the door closed, and he started to work his way toward the front of the boat around the many wagons which filled up the space. Finally he was brought to a halt by a small wagon blocking up his path at a certain point, and while looking for a way out of the difficulty he overheard two persons conversing about the stock market.

It was hardly the right thing for him to stop and listen, and he probably would not have done so, but he heard Golding's name mentioned in a way that seemed to mean that gentleman no good, so he thought it was his duty to find out what was in the wind, especially as one of the speakers addressed the other as Washburn. Jack knew well enough that Washburn was down on his employer like a thousand bricks, and his curiosity was immediately excited to learn what he had to say against Mr. Golding.

"How many shares of D. & H. are afloat, do you think?" Washburn asked of his companion.

"About 40,000, and most of it is held in the Street," was the reply.

"Well, if we can get control of the majority of that—say 30,000 shares, and Blum can get Golding to sell him an option on 20,000—we'll have Mr. G. where the hair is short."

"There are six of us in this scheme," said Washburn's companion, "including Blum, who is just as eager as any of us to scalp Golding, because Golding squeezed him once to the tune of $38,000, and I guess we can raise enough money to work this game all right."

"Don't worry about money," replied Washburn. "I've got Bunker in with us, and besides the hundred thousand he has agreed to put up he's good to loan us all the funds we may need to carry the stock. We'll force the shares way above par, and when we've got 'em as high as they will go inside of ten days, Blum will call on Golding for the stock. He won't be able to deliver it, because we will have scooped in the bulk of it, and then we'll be in a position to dictate terms. We mustn't give him any quarter whatever. If we can only drive him out of the Street it would be an immense satisfaction to me, Saunders," said Washburn, vindictively.

Saunders expressed the same opinion, and then the two bankers moved out of Jack's hearing.

"So that's the game they're up to, is it?" muttered the boy, as he began to edge his way from behind a big express wagon. "I must put Mr. Golding on his guard so that he won't sell an option on D. & H. to Mr. Blum, or anybody else looking for his fleece."

When Jack reached the office he found that Mr. Golding had gone to the Exchange. He decided to run over and see his employer lest Blum should meet him in the meanwhile and get the option from him, according to the plans of the conspirators. Accordingly, he rushed over to the New street entrance and sent an attache out on the floor to hunt up his boss.

"I want to see you a moment on very important business, sir," said Jack, when Mr. Golding came over to the railing.

"What is it?" asked the broker.

"Will you step outside so that I can talk without interruption?"

Mr. Golding, in some surprise, followed him to a vacant corner.

"I am ready to listen to you, Jack," he said, looking fixedly at the boy.

Jack immediately told him about the conversation he had overheard between Washburn and Saunders on the ferry boat. The broker was clearly startled.

"I guess it won't be safe for you to give Mr. Blum that option. What do you think, sir?" asked the boy, eagerly.

"I'm sorry I didn't know this an hour ago," replied Mr. Golding, with some anxiety in his tone.

"Will it make any difference with you?"

"All the difference in the world, Jack. Blum was in my office just before I came over here, and he got that option from me at 89."

"He did, sir?"

"Yes. The only thing I can do now is to try and offset their plans by buying in 20,000 shares right away—that is, if I can get that much, for they must know by this time that Blum had got my option, and they will start in at once buying up the stock, so as to head me off."

"And suppose you are not able to get all the shares you need? You will lose a great deal of money, won't you?"

"I think now that you have warned me so soon that I shall be able to secure the stock. Had this matter been delayed a few days I should probably have had to face absolute ruin. Jack, I shan't forget you in this matter."

"That's all right, sir. I hope I have been able to put you on your guard in time."

Mr. Golding, however, found that it was not easy to get 20,000 shares of D. & H. All he succeeded in buying before the Exchange closed for the day was 10,000, most of which he got at 85 and 86, but the last 2,000 shares cost him 88. The prospect was that he would have to pay very much higher for any more that he succeeded in unearthing. In the meanwhile Jack returned to the office and began to ponder over the case.

"I'll just run over and ask Mr. Richardson if he knows anybody that has some of that stock. Perhaps he has some himself."

So he put on his hat, told Mr. Day that he was going out on business for Mr. Golding, and hurried down to the New York Building. Mr. Richardson was in, and Jack asked him the important question.

"Well, Jack, I haven't any of the stock myself, but my father has a block of 15,000 shares, which I think he will sell. Wait a moment till I 'phone to the house."

In a few minutes Mr. Richardson came back and said:

"You can tell Mr. Golding he can have the block for 86, if he takes it right away."

"All right," replied Jack, thanking him.

He ran over to the Exchange, but Mr. Golding had gone off to see a broker whom he had heard had some of the stock he wanted, and so Jack had to return to the office without seeing him. Looking on the ticker, the boy saw that D. & H. was last quoted at 85 7-8, and fearing it would go above 86, he came to a sudden resolution that he would buy the 15,000 shares himself on a ten per cent. margin, if Mr. Richardson would let him have them that way. He figured out that it would cost him $129,000 to swing the deal, so he went to his safe deposit box and took out all his money but $3,000, and carried it around to Mr. Richardson's office. Mr. Richardson was out, but he asked permission to telephone to the old gentleman at the house. Jack caught him on the wire and told him that he wanted to buy the stock himself on a ten per cent. margin, and was prepared to put up the necessary $129,000.

"You mean you want to buy them for Mr. Golding, isn't that it?" replied Mr. Lee Richardson.

"No, sir. I want the stock myself."

Mr. Richardson the elder seemed to be greatly astonished.

"Do you want me to carry this deal for you so you can make a profit? If you do I will do so, for you have done me a favor worth more than $100,000, and I shall be glad of this opportunity to put you in the way of making some money; but I thought you objected to anything of that kind."

"I am not asking for a favor, Mr. Richardson, otherwise than that you will sell me your stock on a ten per cent. margin. I will give you 86 for the shares, and I have $129,000 cash to put up with your son's cashier if you will oblige me."

Mr. Richardson immediately concluded that the boy was using Mr. Golding's money, and that Mr. Golding didn't want to be identified with the transaction; so he told Jack he could have the stock on his terms, and asked him to send the cashier to the 'phone. Ten minutes later Jack had a memorandum which stated that he had bought the 15,000 shares for his own account for the sum of $129,000 on account, and that the stock would be delivered to him on payment of the balance, together with interest on same for as many days as the stock was held subject to his order. He was also liable for $3,750 in commission to Mr. Lawrence Richardson. With the paper in his pocket Jack returned to the office, satisfied that he would be able to loan his employer enough stock to make up any shortage he was unable to fill himself. Jack put the memorandum in an envelope, and placed it away in the safe, without saying anything to Mr. Golding about it.

"I shall make a good thing out of this, for the clique will force up the price as high as they can make it go inside of ten days. If Mr. Golding gets all the shares he needs I'll sell out by degrees to Washburn and his friends, and they'll have to take it in to sustain the price. If Mr. Golding fails to get all he wants I'll try to break the market and do up Washburn and others by dumping the whole block on the Exchange at once."

Evidently Jack Holland had a great head.

CHAPTER XVI.—A Favorite of Fortune.

The clique had already begun to buy D. & H. wherever they could get it, and Mr. Golding had a great deal of difficulty in getting even 5,000 more shares with the next two days. The last thousand shares cost him 95, and then he was up against it for fair. Attention had now been called to the stock, and the brokers were astonished at its scarcity, and the rapidity with which it advanced in price. When the Exchange closed on Saturday two brokers working in Mr. Golding's interests had both bid 102 for any part of 5,000 shares, without results. The broker called Jack into his office when he came back from the Exchange.

"I've got 15,000 shares, but the other 5,000 I can't get for love or money. I'm afraid I won't be able to deliver them when I'm called upon for them; then Washburn will put the screws on me."

"I wouldn't worry if I were you, sir," replied Jack, cheerfully.

"How can I help it when it seems almost a foregone conclusion that that rascal has me on the hip, and will force his advantage to the uttermost?"

"How high do you think they will be able to boost D. & G.?"

"It's likely to go to 130."

"Well, sir, I can let you have 5,000 shares."

"You can let me have 5,000 shares!" exclaimed the astonished broker.

"Yes, sir."

"What do you mean?" in a tone which seemed to imply that he thought his messenger was making fun of a serious matter.

"Sounds like a dream that your messenger can help you out with 5,000 shares. Not only that, but I have been prepared, if necessary, to furnish you with 15,000 shares."

"Jack Holland, what kind of talk are you giving me?" asked Mr. Golding, severely.

"Nothing that I can't prove. Excuse me a moment, sir."

Jack went out to the safe and got the envelope containing the memorandum of his deal for 15,000 shares of D. & H. with Lee Richardson. He brought it into the private office and showed it to his employer. Mr. Golding gazed at it in a dumfounded way.

"Will you tell me what all this means, Jack?"

"Yes, sir; but it's quite a story."

Jack then gave his boss a history of his transactions on the market, commencing with his first little plunge on 50 shares of D. & E., with the proceeds of Mr. Sangree's check for $300, down to his deal of 4,000 shares in D. A. & N., on which he had cleared $100,000.

"I had $132,000 in my safe deposit box the day you gave Blum that option. I used $129,000 of it to secure these 15,000 shares, thinking you might get stuck, and that I could help you out. I will lend you the 5,000 shares you are short, and then you will be safe; the rest I will sell at high-water mark before your option expires, and I rather guess Washburn and his friends will take them in to prevent you from doing so."

The whole thing was now clear to the broker, and he regarded his messenger with eyes of wonder. Undoubtedly Jack had proved himself the smartest boy by long odds that Mr. Golding had ever heard of in the whole course of his business career.

"Jack Holland, you are a boy in a million. You'll be famous some day as a man, as you are somewhat celebrated in the Street as a boy for your courage and coolness in emergencies. Now, let us talk business. I'll buy those 5,000 shares from you at the present market price, which is 102. That will give you a profit on them of $16 a share, or $80,000."

"No, sir. I don't want to make a profit on you. I did not put the deal through for that object," replied Jack earnestly. "You will lose enough as it is. Besides, I will be able to make a big profit out of the other 10,000 shares."

"Wait a moment, and let me figure this thing out to date, and I will show you how I stand," said the broker, drawing a pad toward him. "I will include your 5,000 shares at 102."

Then Mr. Golding pushed a paper toward Jack. This is what the boy saw:

20,000 shares, various prices.....	$1,830,000
Less 20,000 at 89 (option price)....	1,780,000
Actual loss	$50,000

"The 20,000 shares will cost me together $1,830,000. When Blum calls for the delivery of the stock he will have to hand me his check for $1,780,000, less the $25,000 he put up on deposit. I will, therefore, only lose $50,000. I can easily stand that, and it will be a lesson for me in the future to be cautious about selling options," said Mr. Golding.

"Well, sir," replied Jack, "if you're satisfied I am."

"Certainly I'm satisfied. You have saved me from a great loss by your foresight, backed by the money you possessed. It is a great satisfaction to me that you will clear $80,000 profit on the shares you hand over to me. You deserve more than that for the favor you have done me. I shall never forget it. - I think you have been a messenger quite long enough. After next week you shall go into my counting-room, and I will see to it that you get ahead as fast as you can."

"Thank you, sir," replied Jack.

"Now, for my own satisfaction as well as your profit, I am going to help you turn the tables on that rascal Washburn and his associates, who think they already see my scalp dangling in their wigwams. On Monday I will give you my check for the amount necessary to take over the whole 15,000 shares from Mr. Richardson. I can raise the cash on securtites I possess, and what I fall short I will borrow on call. We will then watch our chance and when D. & H. goes up a little higher we will unload gradually on the market the 10,000 shares. Washburn will try to prevent me from doing so. Then when Blum presents his option I will hand him the 20,000 shares. That will paralyze the clique. It will then be up to them to save themselves by unloading the blocks of stock they have acquired to swing the deal. They'll never be able to do it without a fall in the price of D. & H., and in the panic that is almost certain to ensue they will be snowed under."

Mr. Golding rubbed his hands with joy at the prospect which confronted the unsuspecting conspirators. Everything came out just as the broker had predicted it would. He sold Jack's 10,000 shares in blocks of 2,000 at prices varying from 110 to 115, and the clique had to take it in to carry out their purpose.

Jack's profits on the entire deal were $343,000, which, when he added his capital of $132,000, gave him a financial standing of $475,000—not bad for a boy on the eve of his eighteenth birthday, and two years' experience in the Street. As for Washburn, Blum, and the rest of the clique, they found themselves in the soup for fair after Blum presented his option, and was thoroughly confounded on receiving the stock, which he never for a moment dreamed that Mr. Golding possessed.

They tried to dispose of the stock at the high prices prevailing for D. & H. Had they been able to realize they would have made a big profit anyway. But that was impossible, for the moment they ceased to back the stock, and tried to unload, the shares began to drop. Their defeat soon became a complete rout, and both Washburn and Blum were so badly crippled that they had to leave the Street. The story was bound to leak out, and Jack Holland became the most famous boy that had ever entered the Street. As for the Richardsons, they were amazed at his business sagacity, and the old gentleman prophesied a splendid future for the lad, which has since been abundantly realized, for Jack Holland to-day lives on Riverside Drive in a splendid mansion, the mistress of which was once known as Daisy Richardson. And what shall we say of Dick Garland? He has done very well in Wall Street, and is still Jack's boon companion.

Next week's issue will contain "THROUGH THICK AND THIN; or, THE ADVENTURES OF A SMART BOY."

CURRENT NEWS

MINER'S BODY, BURIED 2 YEARS, IS UNEARTHED

A search of more than two years for the body of Wally Zellinski, a miner, who was buried beneath a rush of coal and debris at the Locust Spring mine of the Philadelphia & Reading Company on September 29, 1921, came to an end with the finding of the man's skeleton in an underground passage of the mine.

Identification was made by his clothes and articles found in the pockets. The search is estimated by officials of the company to have cost $50,000.

70 DIE IN ITALIAN SLIDE

Fifty villagers have been killed at Amalfi by a huge landslide, caused by the recent overflowing of the River Cannetto. Fifteen persons have perished at Pravane and fire at Concamarina. Apparently the whole coast between Salerno and Sorrento has suffered, and grave fears are entertained for the many tourists in this section, a great number of whom are Americans.

Torpedo boats are standing by to render relief and a boat is being rushed from Naples to pick up stranded tourists.

Property damage is reported to be huge. -The famous Cappuccini Convent and many hotels have been destroyed, according to dispatches, together with many vineyards and farmhouses.

PULLMAN COMPANY WARDS AGAINST CARD SHARPS

Organized gangs of card sharps operating on railroad trains are responsible for the posting by the Pullman Company of the following bulletin in its sleeping cars: "Strangers who invite you to play cards generally are too lucky for the average mortal."

The warning is emphasized by a picture showing the corner of the ace of clubs sticking out of a man's pocket.

A Pullman official says there is more robbery by card sharps to-day than at any time in twenty-five years, with the Florida trains one of the great harvest fields.

LOOK! LOOK! LOOK!

MYSTERY MAGAZINE, No. 155

ON ALL NEWSSTANDS TODAY

Get a copy and read these splendid detective and mystery stories if you want to enjoy yourself.

"LAUGHING DEATH'S TRAIL"

A long, gripping detective novelette written by

NELS LEROY JORGENSEN

Then there's a fine two-part tale called "Cold Pearls," of which ROBERT RUSSELL is the author, and the following big list of short stories, every one full of excitement and adventure:

"BEHIND THE DOOR," by John Bellinger, Jr.

"A RING AND A RIDDLE," by James W. Eagan

"WANG FOO'S RIGHT EYE," by Carl G. Hodges

"MR. LEMAR PAYS," by Claude H. Gillespie

"THE ETERNAL DETAIL," by Charles A. Byers

"POWERFUL BANK VAULTS," by Horace Appleton

Then there's a great selection of short articles, such as "Caught Stealing the Payroll," "1,000 Men Battled a Negro," "A $50,000 Haul," "Shot by a Minneapolis Detective," "Foiled by a Rookie Cop" and "Pickpockets Stole a Man's Last Nickel."

More Stories Than Ever in This Magazine

DON'T MISS READING IT!

ROB AND THE REPORTERS

— Or, —

Hustling for War News by Wireless

By GASTON GARNE

(A Serial Story.)

CHAPTER II.—(Continued).

He closed the door when Rob followed him into the room, and said:—

"Now look here, boy, I didn't bring you down here for the fun of the thing. I thought I saw a chance to get a man of my own choosing a steady job at the wireless station, and I think so still. If I was to put you in there, I want you to stand by me and see that my news agency gets first crack at all the war news. Mind, I say all. Will you promise me this?"

"Now the cat is out of the bag," thought Rob, and he hesitated before replying.

"Speak up! What's the matter with you?" blurted Garvey. "Isn't it enough that I took you off the street and made you a present of twenty-five dollars? Say?"

"I shall have to abide by the rules," replied Rob.

"Rules be hanged! While you are on night duty I shall be on hand every night for the present; the same by day when you take the day shift. The other man I've got fixed; the one who has been working the night shift we couldn't touch. That's why you're here—see? But I guess you don't quite understand yet. The twenty-five per comes out of my pocket. You get your salary besides."

It was a temptation for Rob; there was no denying it.

He knew his business. Here was just the sort of job he wanted offering double pay.

"Is young French to be discharged?" he asked.

"Have you been snooping around the station when I told you not to?" asked Garvey, quickly.

"No, I haven't. Just the same, I happened to meet French."

"I hope, then, you didn't do any talking?"

"No, I didn't."

"Well, what's your decision? French will be discharged to-night, all right, and for blame good reasons. The job is yours for the asking. If you don't want it I'll thank you to hand me back what's left of that twenty-five."

"I'll take the job and do my best to please you," said Rob.

He had been tempted, and he had fallen!

CHAPTER III.

Rob Gets A Wireless Job.

Let us not blame Rob too much.

His situation was a trying one. He was without friends or money.

For a full month he had tried to catch on either as a wireless operator or a reporter and had failed.

"That's all right," said Garvey, looking immensely pleased. "I thought you were no fool. I can usually size a man up," and he went on to explain in detail just what it was he wanted, which need not be particularized.

There was further talk over the supper-table.

The longer Rob listened the more disgusted he felt with himself, but just the same he determined to go ahead.

"If I can only land the job I'll do as I please about taking his bribe," he told himself. "If it isn't too rank, I may stand it a week or two, but if it is I'll give the whole snap away to the company."

And with such thoughts he satisfied his conscience.

"Now, I'm going right down to the station," said Garvey after supper. "You follow in half an hour. You will find Mr. Finch, the manager, there. Apply for a job. Of course, you will be surprised to meet me there and all that sort of thing."

Rob nodded, and Garvey then left.

Half an hour later Rob presented himself at the wireless station, where he found the day operator at the receiver, while the tall man whom he had seen getting off the train was talking with Garvey.

"Why, hello, Rob!" cried the latter. "Where in the world did you spring from? Haven't seen you in an age," and he shook hands as with a long-lost friend.

"Mr. Finch, this is Mr. Randall," he added. "Randall is an excellent wireless operator, they tell me. Perhaps he can help you out if French don't show up."

"By heavens, whether he comes back or not, if you saw him drunk at Glenmore, as you say, I'll discharge him," declared the manager. "Sit down there, young man, and show us what you can do. Brown, hold on a few minutes. Are you prepared to go right to work?"

"I am," replied Rob.

"Then if the makes good you can go, Brown. Go ahead, Randall."

Rob took his place at the receiver and quickly demonstrated his skill.

"You're all right," declared Mr. Finch. "Good-night, Brown. Not a word to French if you happen to meet him. I shall remain here all night. If he shows up I'll do the talking."

Brown departed, and shortly afterward Mr. Garvey arose to go.

"Hold on a minute," said Rob. "I'm pulling off a very important message from London."

He wrote it out and handed it to the manager:

"England has declared war on Germany."

Mr. Finch promptly showed the message to Garvey.

"I'm off," cried the latter, and he was gone in an instant.

Later several reporters came in and were given that and other important news.

Meanwhile, Mr. Finch had explained the rules to Rob, which were rather a relief to him.

(To be continued.)

GOOD READING

DISH OF THE PROPHET

One of the oldest dishes of which any record can be found is the Arabian "khabis," which is said to have been invented and named by the prophet Mohammed. It consists of fine selected dates coated with a mixture of honey and butter, and it is still a favorite dessert and confection among the Orientals to whom the date is a staple food. It is interesting to note that the word "khabis" has come to be used by the Arabs as a synonym for happiness.

The first prophet of Islam must have been a very skillful dietitian, for his favorite dish would be an almost perfect and very digestible food. Dates contain a form of sugar which is especially easy for the human body to assimilate and also protein, fat, lime, iron and cellulose or roughage. With the butter to increase the protein content of the mixture and the honey supplying more sugar in a digestible form the prophet's delight would make an excellent meal all by itself.

FOREST RECLAIMS TOWN

Rudyard Kipling's tale of the devastated Indian village which "went back to the jungle" has a prototype in Norwich Township, McKean County, Pa., since the site of the once flourishing lumber town of Norwich has become State Game Refuge No. 30.

Twenty years ago the site of the town was hewn out of the forest by the Norwich Lumber Company, with headquarters at Buffalo, N. Y. A large sawmill was erected and other industries were established, and for fifteen years Norwich was a thriving town of 1,500 people, with schools, churches, theatres and stores.

Then the timber in the adjacent forests became exhausted, the lumber company dismantled the mill and moved it away, and the town began to fade from the map. About three years ago the whole site of the town was sold as part of a large tract taken over by the State as a game preserve. The remaining buildings in the village were torn down and moved away, until only one structure was left, a church. This also was sold and torn down about a year ago.

N. R. Buller, Commissioner of State Fisheries, announced that Indian Run, Havens Brook and Long Hollow Run, brooks which flow through the refuge, were to be closed to fishermen for five years and would be used as nurseries for the propagation of brook trout. These were famous trout streams twenty-five years ago.

Bears, deer and wild-cats roam the brush-grown streets of Norwich, and the once flourishing village has gone back to the forest.

THE CHIMNEY BLUFFS

On the shore of Lake Ontario, about five miles east ofodus Point, are the Chimney Bluffs. Little visited by tourists because out of the way of the traveler, yet worthy of attention. Their unique formation and weird beauty are worth attention.

These bluffs are hard to describe. They are about half a mile in length, gradually increasing in height from the level of the lake at either end. From the decks of lake steamers they look like the usual lake bluffs, only higher, but a closer inspection discloses to the beholder a formation that fills one with astonishment. These bluffs are serrated in form, running out to the water's edge in sharp points, 100, 200, perhaps 300 feet in height, only a few inches wide, widening to several feet further in. Between each point the elements have cut ravines hundreds of feet deep.

The points, wedge-shaped, dividing the ravines or gorges, are several hundred feet apart and as they run toward the lake, becoming too narrow for vegetation, they terminate in a series of bare pinnacles which give them their name—"Chimneys."

The pictures presented in the gorges and across them from peaks are enchanting in their changing colors as the shadows are thrown on the sides and peaks, of chimneys and gorges by the passing sun, while the broader view from the summits is, without a doubt, the finest the tourist sees on either shore of Lake Ontario. Every one who likes to get out of the "beaten paths" should visit the "Chimneys."

"Mystery Magazine"

SEMI-MONTHLY 10 CENTS A COPY

— LATEST ISSUES —

- 148 HOUNDED, by Frank Blighton.
- 149 DIRECT ACTION, by Dr. Harry Eaton.
- 150 THE FOOTPRINTS ON THE CEILING, by Chas. F. Oursler.
- 151 THE ONE CHANCE, by Thomas Ripley.
- 152 WEAPONS OF HATE, by Eric Howard.
- 153 IN RESERVE, by Frank Blighton.
- 154 THE HOUSE ON THE ROCKS, by Jack Bechdel.

The following and future numbers of this magazine
Price 15 Cents

LAUGHING DEATH'S TRAIL

By NELS LEROY JORGENSEN

Out Today in No. 155

HARRY E. WOLFF, Publisher, Inc.

166 West 23d Street New York City

"Moving Picture Stories"

A Weekly Magazine Devoted to Photoplays and Players

PRICE EIGHT CENTS PER COPY

Each number contains Three Stories of the Best Films on the Screen. Elegant Half-tone Scenes from the Plays - Interesting Articles About Prominent People in the Films. Doings of Actors and Actresses in the Studio and Lessons in Scenario Writing.

HARRY E. WOLFF, Publisher, Inc.

166 West 23d Street New York

INTERESTING RADIO NEWS AND HINTS

PUBLISHERS WANT "RADIO RIGHTS"

As most books of the present day are protected by "serial" "movie" and "dramatic" rights, so the books of the future are likely to be covered by "radio" rights. Authors and publishers want to receive royalties from the works that are broadcast to the unseen listeners. Certain publishers of books and novels are taking steps whereby the copyrights of their publications will be protected as far as radio broadcasting is concerned.

WEDDED BY WIRELESS

The crew of a British trawler from the Arctic regions report being present at a wireless wedding at Matochkin Shar, Nova Zembla, where the Soviet Government has a large station.

The British crew amused themselves listening in nightly, and one night heard Matochkin calling for the marriage commissar at Archangel. When the commissar reported himself the station at Matochkin answered that one of its female employes wanted to register her marriage.

The commissar wirelessly the usual questions and then pronounced the marriage complete.

TUNER FOR GRIMES CIRCUIT

It is not at all necessary to use a variocoupler for the tuning elements in the Grimes Inverse Duplex receiver. Any other form of tuner which is designed to permit a variation in the coupling between the tuning coils can be satisfactorily employed for this purpose. Such means of tuning may consist of two spider web coils so arranged that their inductive coupling can be varied. Of course, the usual variable condenser of 43 plates will have to be used in the primary circuit in order to permit it to be tuned.

A FALSE STANDARD

It is a misnomer to rate the capacity of a variable condenser according to the number of plates. And yet there are many who list variable condensers as 11, 23, 43, or any number of plates.

That this method of rating the size of a condenser is inaccurate may be gathered from the following illustration: Suppose two novices are each making a set which calls for a 43-plate variable condenser. One man goes to a dealer and buys a certain 43-plate condenser which has a capacity of .001 microfarads. The other man buys a 43-plate condenser in another store which measures .00077 microfarads. The difference in capacity is sufficient to cause a variation in tuning of perhaps 100 meters.

All diagrams should indicate condenser capacity in microfarads (mfd.), and it would be a step ahead in matters of standardization in the radio field if manufacturers and dealers would label their condensers with true ratings of their capacities in microfarads.

RADIO HOLDS UP OPERA

A story coming from Brazil tells how the President of that republic expressed the desire for a radio receiving set. The installation was made in the Brazilian White House and an operator went to the palace to explain the operation of the instruments. An opera was scheduled to be broadcast from the Municipal Theatre in Rio de Janeiro through the microphone of Station SPC in that city. It was long past the hour for the music to enter the ether, but not a sound could be heard, although the set appeared to be working all right.

The operator called the station and was informed that the opera had not begun. Then he called the theatre and located the trouble.

"Your Excellency," he reported to the President, "the entire audience is awaiting your arrival. The opera cannot start until you are seated." The President rushed off to the theatre and soon other members of the family who had stayed at home heard the ovation greeting the President upon his arrival.

THE BIG FACTOR IN RANGE

One of the first questions asked by the novice when he is looking over outfits for the purpose of making a purchase is, "How great a distance can this radio music be heard?" This question is one that cannot be very well answered.

Radio can be compared to the effect one obtains while standing at the shore of a pond that is still and tossing a stone into the water. A circle of waves will start about the place where the stone dropped. If the pond is large enough there will be no waves perceptible at the edge. However, one could not pick out a single spot and say, "On this side the waves are visible and on the other side they are invisible. Therefore, there are none on this side."

This is much the same as in the situation of a receiving set, but with this important difference: The distance that a receiving set will receive audibly will depend on the receiving set. A concert may be quite audible on one set and on another may not be heard at all.

A part of this difference may be due to different hookups, the degree of amplification employed and the sensitivity of the phones. A great deal of difference may be found in the batteries employed in applying current to the set. Owing to the importance of the batteries there is one type especially made for the purpose and an automobile battery cannot be used with the best of results.

The best way to test out an amplifying transformer is by substitution. The average fan does not have the facilities to test out a transformer. We would suggest begging or borrowing one, in order to substitute it for the one you believe is burned out. If the transformer substituted gives good results it is certain that your own transformer is ruined.

RERADIATING RECEIVERS

It is illegal to operate a radio transmitter without permission from the Government. Your neighbor who lets his single circuit receiver oscillate and cause to spoil your reception of the broadcast concerts is transmitting. Legally he is liable to a penalty. There has been no case of this nature in this section, but some one some day will bring one. Then, perhaps, some operators of "nuisance receivers" will realize what they are doing.

The campaign against reradiating receivers seems to be gaining headway. All through the country the radio departments of newspapers are printing warnings to owners of single circuit sets of the harm careless operation of these sets are doing to radio. Owners of receiving sets are learning the causes of the squeals and are spreading the information among their friends. The reradiation squeal is so very much of a nuisance that it is reasonable to believe that the evil will in the course of a few months be eliminated by the broadcast listeners themselves. If it is not the only thing that can be done is to have laws barring the use of receivers capable of annoying reradiation.

Most of the harm done is by the general use of the zero beat method of tuning. There may be some excuse for the zero beat method of tuning if W D A P or K F I is through, although it really is not much more efficient than the "follow up method." When the zero method is used in Brooklyn to catch W J Z, W E A F or W O R, the whole proceeding is silly and indicates that the operator using it has a depression where his bump of intelligence ought to be. If a Brooklynite can't get a local station without squealing in and out of it half a dozen times his neighbors can only conclude that his set is hopelessly inefficient, that his knowledge of tuning is very small or that he simply doesn't care.

The shame of it is that the single circuit receiver is a good receiver when intelligently constructed and used. The trouble is that so few persons intelligently use it.

Broadcast listeners who know the harm that reradiation is doing can assist in the war on the nuisance by letting their friends know what causes the squealing. A friendly visit to a neighbor and a demonstration of the tuning in of the stations without letting the set squeal will help.

TUBES OF MANY TYPES

All vacuum tubes are not identical nor are they interchangeable. They may look alike to most people, especially if they are of the same size and kind, but there may be slight differences in the internal dimensions and degree of vacuum or gas contents which are not apparent upon close examination.

First there is the dry cell tube classed as the WD11 and 12, followed by the three volt tube called the UV199 or C299. Among the tubes referred to as six volt tubes are the PV200 or C300 and the UV201A or C301A. Many radio fans believe that the dry cell tubes are as good as the storage battery tubes. Is there any theory in this?

For an experiment take the UV199 tube. Every one knows who has used this tube that its elements are smaller than those in the larger tubes, therefore it cannot be expected that the output from such tubes can be equal. Its filament, supported between two uprights, is short compared to that of the larger storage battery tubes. What is lacking in its filament is made up in efficiency by the materials employed in its construction.

For its filament the UV199 tube employs toriated tungsten, which gives off a maximum quantity of electrons, with a minimum amount of energy applied to its filament.

This tube is a good radio frequency tube. If one looks at the bottom of this tube it will be seen that the studs are short compared to other tubes on the market. This is an important factor, especially for radio frequency amplification, since it eliminates a great amount of capacity. Then, too, the grid and plate studs are not adjacent, as in other tubes, but are opposite each other. This feature tends to reduce capacity effect between them.

The UV199 tube is satisfactory for audio frequency amplification but it will not give an output comparable with UV201A or other six volt tubes. If, however, sufficient precautions are taken enough volume can be had from the UV199 or C299 to operate a loud talker.

Another type of tube is the WD11 or the WD12. The WD12 tube, with prongs not quite as short as the UV199, constitutes a good radio frequency amplifier but when used as an audio frequency amplifier it is well to add a C battery in the second stage.

When using dry cell tubes in combination with other tubes care must be taken to get the proper filament voltage on the tube. It is not advisable to employ a dry cell tube as a R. F. tube, a UV199 as a detector and two six volt tubes as amplifiers all drawing voltage from the one battery. Unless the beginner be conversant with the requirements of all the tubes it is best to use the same type throughout the set.

The best tube for a detector is classed as a soft tube and requires a critical adjustment on both A and B batteries. Tubes of this type are extremely sensitive. The variation of the filament current is accomplished by means of a variable resistance or rheostat placed in series with the filament lighting battery.

The majority of vacuum tube detectors operate best on B batteries between sixteen and twenty-two volts.

Amplifier tubes look like detector tubes and cannot easily be distinguished except by examining their electrical characteristics. Amplifiers are not critical in adjustment when compared with the detector tubes. They will operate successfully on voltages of 45 to 100. When a detector tube together with two stages of amplification are used three or four twenty-two volt B batteries may be connected together in series. Where extremely loud signals are desired the plate voltage may be raised to 100 volts without damaging the tubes. However, the use of such high voltage increases tube noises and is therefore not to be recommended.

The difference between audio and radio frequency amplification is that when an incoming signal which is at high frequency is rectified by the detector it is changed into low frequency, and this is amplified by the following amplifiers. By means of radio frequency amplifications the incoming signals are amplified before they reach the detector tube and signals that would not ordinarily be strong enough to be detected are amplified to a higher degree.

Fame and Fortune Weekly

NEW YORK, APRIL 25, 1924

TERMS TO SUBSCRIBERS

Single Copies.....	Postage Free	8 Cents
One Copy Three Months.....	"	$1.00
One Copy Six Months.....	"	2.00
One Copy One Year.....	"	4.00
Canada, $4.50; Foreign, $5.00.

HOW TO SEND MONEY—At our risk send P. O. Money Order, Check or Registered Letter; remittances in any other way are at your risk. We accept Postage Stamps the same as cash. When sending silver wrap the Coin in a separate piece of paper to avoid cutting the envelope. Write your name and address plainly. Address letters to

HARRY E. WOLFF, } Harry E. Wolff, Pres.
 Publisher, Inc., } Charles E. Nylander, Sec.
 166 W. 23d St., N. Y. } L. F. Wilzin, Treas.

ITEMS OF INTEREST

RICHES CAME AT RIGHT TIME

Only a few hours before the sheriff was due to serve foreclosure papers on Noble Root, a blind and aged resident of Shelburne, Vt., and seize the Root homestead for unpaid interest, the man was notified that a distant relative had died intestate and that he was the only heir to $10,000.

NEW CIGAR BOX WOOD

Spanish cedar may be supplanted as raw material for cigar boxes by a Philippine wood known as kalantas, if residents of the islands who are interested in the development of the lumber business there have their way. According to a report of the Philippine Forestry Service that has been received by the Department of Commerce, kalantas is practically identical with Spanish cedar from tropical America, and has the further advantage of being grown in a possession of the United States. Spanish cedar has heretofore been considered the finest wood obtained in the world for cigar boxes, but kalantas is said to be so nearly like it in color, texture and odor that only an expert woodsman can tell them apart.

200 GIRL GRADUATES TO BE DRESSED ALIKE

The 200 sweet girl graduates from Wichita High School, Wichita, Kan., will all look alike when they cross the platform to receive their diplomas this year.

This decision was reached recently at the exciting meeting of the senior girls in the auditorium of the high school, when belt line, skirt line and sleeve line assumed equal importance with the matter of material and design for the uniform dress which the class had decided some time ago will be worn.

The white linen from which the dresses will be made is to be purchased by the bolt, so that all dresses will be made from exactly the same material. Each girl will make her own dress under certain specific rules.

LAUGHS

Mother—Tommy, I don't like to have you play with boys who are bad. Tommy—But the good boys are no good, mamma.

Mifkins—I wonder what drove Smiley to drink. Bifkins—Why, I wasn't aware that Smiley had to be driven.

Jess—I'm in a quandary! Bess—what? Jess—Tom promises to stop gambling if I marry him, and Jack threatens to begin if I don't.

Irene—Isn't this a lovely belt? Jack sent it to me as a present. Maud—It fits you to perfection. He must have measured it on his arm.

"What happens when a man's temperature goes down as low as it can go?" asked the teacher. "He gets cold feet," answered a small pupil.

"I don't like to say such long prayers," said a little girl the other night. "I want to say nice short ones like nurse's does." "What kind does nurse say?" inquired her mother. "Oh, she just says, 'Oh, Lord, why do I have to get up?'"

Statement of the ownership, management, etc., required by the Act of Congress of August 24, 1912, of "FAME AND FORTUNE WEEKLY," published weekly at New York, N. Y., for April 1, 1924. State of New York, County of New York:—Before me a Notary Public in and for the State and county aforesaid, personally appeared Luis Senarens, who, having been duly sworn according to law, deposes and says that he is the editor of "FAME AND FORTUNE WEEKLY" and that the following is, to the best of his knowledge and belief, a true statement of the ownership, management, etc., of the aforesaid publication for the date shown in the above caption required by the Act of August 24, 1912, embodied in section 413, Postal Laws and Regulations, to wit:

1. That the names and addresses of the publisher, editor and business manager are: Publisher—Harry E. Wolff, Publisher, Inc., 166 West 23d Street, New York, N. Y. Editor—Luis Senarens, 166 West 23d Street, New York, N. Y. Managing Editor—None. Business Manager—None.

2. That the owners are: Harry E. Wolff, Publisher, Inc., 166 West 23d Street, New York, N. Y.; Harry E. Wolff, 166 West 23d Street, New York, N. Y.; M. N. Wolff, 166 West 23d Street, New York, N. Y.; J. F. Desbecker, 166 West 23d Street, New York, N. Y.; R. W. Desbecker, 166 West 23d Street, New York, N. Y.; C. W. Hastings, 166 West 23d Street, New York, N. Y.

3. That the known bondholders, mortgagees and other security holders owning or holding 1 per cent or more of total amount of bonds, mortgages or other securities are: None.

4. That the two paragraphs next above giving the names of the owners, stockholders and security holders, if any, contain not only the list of stockholders and security holders as they appear upon the books of the company, but also, in cases where the stockholder or security holder appears upon the books of the company as trustee or in any other fiduciary relation, the name of the person or corporation for whom such trustee is acting is given; also that the said two paragraphs contain statements embracing affiant's full knowledge and belief as to the circumstances and conditions under which stockholders and security holders who do not appear upon the books of the company as trustees hold stock and securities in a capacity other than that of a bona fide owner; and this affiant has no reason to believe that any other person, association or corporation has any interest, direct or indirect, in the said stock, bonds or other securities than as so stated by him.

LUIS SENARENS, Editor.

Sworn to and subscribed before me this 27th day of March, 1924. Seymour W. Spriet, (My Commission expires March 30, 1924.)

BRIEF BUT POINTED

PLANS TO RIDE FALLS IN A BIG RUBBER BALL

Bobby Leach, who went over the Horseshoe Falls in a steel barrel on July 25, 1911, announced that he is negotiating with a rubber company for the manufacture of a rubber ball, in which he plans to make a trip over the Falls early next June. Prior to the Falls trip Leach says he will make three parachute leaps from the upper steel arch bridge on successive Sundays.

The ball will be of the thickness of an ordinary large automobile tire and will have a hammock inside in which he will recline, Leach said. He plans to have the ball with himself as passenger placed in the water a few hundred feet above the Falls on the Canadian side. He believes that the ball will clear the great plunge of water and will land safely in the river below.

Leach has attracted attention by daring feats about the Falls for several years. In addition to going over the Falls in a barrel, he made a parachute leap from the upper bridge on April 21, 1921, and went through the lower rapids and whirlpool in a barrel on June 28, 1911.

STEEL FURNITURE

Furniture of steel is admirably adapted for use in the home and possesses certain advantages which the ordinary furniture made of wood does not offer. When steel furniture is prepared for the home or office it is finished with an attractive surface in stove enamel, the color and finish being adapted to the room and purpose for which the article is intended.

Adjustable steel shelving is particularly adapted for kitchen use and finished with a hard white enamel surface and looks extremely clean and inviting. These shelves can be used for ordinary pots and pans, and for the storage of vegetables, etc. For kitchen and pantry steel is much more hygienic than wood.

The steel cupboard is also invaluable in the store, for it provides dry and yet well ventilated shelving in which to store rice, flour, sugar, etc. Ventilating louvres in the doors provide for fresh air, and these apertures can be covered with a fine mesh wire to secure complete immunity from spiders, flies or vermin of any kind.

The housewife in warm climates will rejoice in such a cupboard for her storeroom, ventilated yet perfectly protected from the ravages of ants, cockroaches and all other pests of the lands of perpetual sunshine.

ROMAN FORT RUINS FOUND IN CARDIFF

The ruins of a Roman fort, seven acres in extent, one of the largest in Wales, will be uncovered soon. The fort is known as "Y Gaer" and is two and one-half miles west of Brecon. The excavation, it is expected, will throw much light on the relationship of the native and Roman inhabitants of Wales during a period of two or more centuries. The history of a large fort, such as the Gaer, when fully known, should be a mine of information of much of the history of Wales.

The Gaer Excavation Committee, of which Lord Kenyon is chairman, met in Cardiff recently and took immediate steps to raise the $10,000 needed for the excavation. The defenses of the fort include a bank and a wall nine feet high. The gateways, where exposed, are of massive masonry which recalls that of the great forts of Hadrian's Wall. Within the defenses the remains of stone buildings are known to exist beneath the turf and outside of these will be found, it is expected, the ruins of the civil settlement which usually sprang up beneath the walls of a fortress of this type.

A few yards away from the fort stands the carved Roman tombstone of a man and his wife, long a local landmark, known as the "Main y Morwynion" or "Maiden's Stone." In the neighborhood has been found another stone whose inscription proves that the fort, at one time, was garrisoned by a cavalry regiment originally recruited in Spain.

It is hoped to begin the excavation in July under the direction of Dr. R. E. M. Wheeler of the National Museum of Wales.

INTERESTING ITEMS

A brick house, if of average material and workmanship, will last one hundred years.

Russia has more Hebrews than any other nation in the world. The number is about 5,800,000.

A farm for raising butterflies and moths has been established near Scarborough, England.

The city authorities of Rochester, Pa., prohibit the wearing of slashed skirts in the public streets.

Almost 1,000,000 tourists visit the Alps each year, of whom about twenty-five meet with fatal accidents.

Living is cheap in Japan. Six to eight dollars a month will supply both fuel and clothing for a family of five persons.

In the Swiss canyon of Wallis the medieval custom still exists of ringing all the church bells to avert an impending thunderstorm or an untimely fall of snow.

In Benares, India, there has been for many years a temple for the reception of monkeys, and it is one of the most costly buildings there. The followers of Brahma hold this animal sacred and worship it as a deity.

Among the extraordinary frauds which have been perpetrated was one put into operation by a company of schemers who told a confiding public that many fortunes were to be made by importing into England compressed dried grapes from Spain, Italy and elsewhere, then saturating them with good English water and making wine from them. It was stated in the prospectus that dried grapes could be imported at a much cheaper rate than wine and that it was possible to produce an equal quantity of wine as good as that made abroad. Thousands of pounds were subscribed by the British public, who firmly believed in the idea until the scheme collapsed.

ITEMS OF INTEREST

FOUND GOLD IN CELLAR

Between $500 and $700 in gold and silver coins was unearthed by workmen at a vacant house at No. 318 Pine street, Baltimore, recently. Word of the "gold mine" spread like wildfire through the colored section nearby and soon scores of men and women had abandoned everything else to dig in the pile of dirt in front of the house.

By the time the police arrived and drove them away scores of searchers had reached dazzling heights of wealth by the acquisition of three or four $10 gold pieces. Discovery by the El Dorado in the vacant house was made by workmen who were remodeling it. They were digging in the cellar and throwing the dirt on the sidewalk in front when one of the men noticed something shining in the dirt. Idly he bent over and picked it up. It was a $10 gold piece.

GREEN ORANGES CAN BE COLORED

An orange may be inwardly ripe when outwardly green and if allowed to yellow on the trees the marketing may be delayed four to six weeks and consequently a less favorable price may be obtained, writes The Scientific American.

This green condition gives the Satsufa orange grower more concern than others. Satsumas are raised in upper Florida, lower Alabama and lower Mississippi. Normally they are gathered about October 15, but they can be harvested earlier when artificial processes of coloring are used to get away from the persistent greenness of skin.

The United States Department of Agriculture has worked out a process for coloring oranges without harming the fruit. The process consists of enclosing the oranges in tight rooms and subjecting them to fumes of kerosene stoves or to gasoline engine exhaust. The fumes given off destroy the green chlorophyll so that the yellow of the orange shows up. It requires about four days to bring out the yellow of the oranges by this process. This is better than waiting four to six weeks for the fruit to ripen on the trees, running the risk of frost or storm damage and facing the probability of a lower market when the oranges are ultimately harvested.

RIO GIRLS DESERT BEACHES RATHER THAN WEAR SKIRTS

Owing to a sudden burst of modesty on the part of the police of Rio de Janeiro the thousands who enjoy the splendid surf bathing on this city's beautiful beaches have been submitted to new and severe regulations. The new rules are especially irksome to those youths and maidens who feel that they have no reason to complain of nature's handiwork.

A considerable number of bathers have been rudely yanked from the beaches because they tried to get by with "one-piece" bathing suits. In addition to paying fines, they were obliged to promise to wear them below the knee hereafter.

The frequenters of one fashionable beach were indignant at the new restrictions and planned a unique protest. They agreed to go for their morning plunge on a certain day, the men being dressed in frock coats and high silk hats, and the women in their demurest day dresses. This scheme was accompanied by a campaign of publicity.

The police checked this move also, prohibiting the demonstration. The organizers of the protest then sought a court injunction against the police to enable them to bathe in their silk hats and everything if they wanted to. The court ruled, however, that the police were within their rights because the purpose of the protest was to ridicule established authority.

As a result of the dispute, the sea waves now wash Rio's beautiful beaches in lonesome monotony.

LOOK, BOYS!

TRAPEZEE

The Acrobatic Wonder Toy

ALMOST HUMAN IN ITS ACTIONS!

It consists of a handsome parallel iron frame on which the little yellow man accurately performs like an athlete.

Five Different Stunts—

THE FLYING TRAPEZE—Release the trigger-pin and the figure swings forward, gripping the brass trapeze-bar, turns a somersault in the air and catches a cross-bar by his heels.

THROUGH THE LOOP—A swift swing and he goes through a wire loop, makes a turn and, catching by his heels, swings head downward from a bar.

THE GIANT SWING—He goes forward with a rush, releases the trapeze, catches a horizontal-bar with his heels, makes two swift somersaults in the air and catches by his heels again.

He performs two more horizontal-bar acts with the grace and agility of a circus star, and many new ones can be invented.

The Most Wonderful Toy in the World!

PRICE $1.50

The collapsible stand and the little manikin are neatly packed in a handsome box. Delivered anywhere in the United States on receipt of price. Address

WOLFF NOVELTY CO.,

166 W. 23d St., New York City, N. Y.

City..... State.....

MUSKET HOUSE. T. G. Roberts. A thrilling creepy mystery of old Quebec in an old Canadian homestead. -Cass of Stage in London and New York for the

Delivered to you Free for 30 days trial on approval. Your choice of 44 Styles, colors and sizes of the famous Ranger Bicycles. Express prepaid. Bicycles $21.50 and up.

$5 a Month if desired. Many boys and girls easily make the bicycle earn the small monthly payments.

Tires wheels, lamps and equipment at half usual prices. Write for remarkable factory prices and marvelous offers.

MEAD CYCLE COMPANY
DEPT. C188 CHICAGO

Write us today for free catalog

Get Rid of Your F A T Free Trial Treatment

Sent on request. Ask for my "pay-when-reduced" offer. I have successfully reduced thousands of persons, often at the rate of a pound a day, without diet or exercise. Let me send you proof at my expense.

DR. R. NEWMAN, Licensed Physician
State of New York, 286 Fifth Avenue
New York, Desk W

FRONTIER SPECIAL FAMOUS SIDE SWING

NEW 1924 model, blue steel, 6-shot famous Frontier Special, swing-out band-ejector revolver with 3-inch barrel. Imported from Spain, the equal of any $35 model, and specially priced for limited time to add new customers.

LOW PRICE SPECIAL in 32, 32-20, or 38 cal., our No. 35D $11.95

Extra Special, our No. 260A, latest 1924 model of blue steel. Each revolver has passed strict Government test. 32 cal., 6-shot $14.95

32-20 or 38 cal., 6-shot $15.45

20-SHOT "PANTHER" RAPID FIRE AUTOMATIC

LIMITED quantity of brand new, 32 cal. $8.45

"Panthers," 10 shots with extra magazine making 20 rapid fire shots. Special at

Above guns all shoot any standard American cartridge

PAY POSTMAN ON DELIVERY plus postage.

Money back promptly if not satisfied.

CONSUMERS CO., Dept. P1D 1265 Broadway, N.Y.

TOBACCO

Habit Cured or No Pay

Any form, cigars, cigarettes, pipe, chewing or snuff Guaranteed. Harmless. Complete treatment sent on trial. Costs $1.00 if it cures. Nothing if it fails. SUPERBA CO. M-21, Baltimore, Md.

OLD MONBY WANTED

$2 to $500 EACH paid for hundreds of old coins. Keep ALL Old or odd money, it may be VERY valuable. Send 10 cts. for ILLUSTRATED COIN VALUE BOOK, 4x6. Get Posted. We pay CASH. CLARKE COIN CO., Ave 13, LeRoy, N. Y.

TOBACCO, LIQUOR and MORPHINE

Habits can be overcome with the aid of HILL'S CHLORIDE OF GOLD PREPARATIONS. Liquor remedy can be given secretly. Particulars Free.

OHIO CHEMICAL WORKS,
Dept. 6, Westfield, N. Y.

'SAY! JOHNNY!'

(Or Eddie, Charlie or Frank!) If you're a "go-getter" we have an offer to make that will put money in your pocket every day, or every week—good, clean money that you will earn by doing just a little work for us that both your father and mother will approve. The first boy in each locality to qualify will have the preference. No money wanted. No premiums to earn. Just good pay for all that you do—and our help in your doing of it.

Sit down and write—right now—and we'll send you all the particulars. A postal will do. Address

THE PATHFINDER DESK 24 WASHINGTON, D.C.

GOITRE Pay When Well

I have an honest, proven remedy for goitre (big neck). It checks the growth at once, reduces the enlargement, stops pain and distress and relieves in a little while. Pay when well. Tell your friends about this. Write me at once. DR. ROCK.

Dept. 96 Box 737, Milwaukee, Wis.

FREE BASEBALL OUTFIT

RUSH your name and address and we will tell you HOW you can get this Baseball Outfit, consisting of:

- 1 of Baseball Suit, Cap, Fielder's Glove, Live League Baseball, Catcher's Mitt

ABSOLUTELY FREE. Write at once for FREE Baseball Outfit. HOME SUPPLY CO. 191 Duane St., Dept. 837 NEW YORK

WEIRD MYSTO OUTFIT

The ORIGINAL WEIRD Mysto Talisman ring—wards off evil spirits, sickness, spells, enemies, etc. Ancient belief, brings Success to wearer in LOVE, business, games, ALL undertakings. Green Gold finish, snakes set with Lucky Mysto Ruby and Emerald, fits any finger. ALSO

The startling MYSTO WONDER amazing and mysterious instrument answers ALL questions. LOVE? Hate? Enemies? Marriage? Children? Money? Life? Luck?

FREE with Outfit—Directions and Question Booklet—A DREAM BOOK—ALSO Free plan to make money. Pay on arrival $1.97. Plus Postage.

MYSTO CO., 103 E. 125th St., Dept. 1390, N.Y.C.

ICE IN JUNE AND JULY

Lateness of spring this year and the statement that the sun is sending the earth less heat have led to many comparisons with 1816, "the year without a summer."

Records of the Government department contain a full report on the summer of 1816, repetition of which is feared in some quarters. The mean temperature in Philadelphia, according to records, for April of that year was 47. With a mild beginning, the month terminated with cold and blustering weather.

May had a temperature of 64, which promised a fair season. June was cold, with an average temperature of 64. There was ice and vegetables were injured. Six to ten inches of snow fell in Vermont, three inches in New York and several inches in New Hampshire and Maine.

The average temperature for July was only 68, with freezing weather which formed ice. On the morning of the 5th, ice was reported as thick as window glass in Pennsylvania, New York and throughout New England.

The mean temperature for August was 66.

SPICES IN HISTORY

The tantalizing flavor and piquant qualities of spices have them sought after from the earliest days of mankind, and an adjunct to civilization at all periods.

In the early days of history spices were worth fabulous sums, owing to the difficulty of obtaining them and the high cost of transportation.

When Alaric the Goth conquered Rome in 410 A. D., he asked as a ransom 3,000 pounds of pepper, then worth more than its weight in gold. The first organization of dealers, it is said, was the "fraternity of pepperers," and it was in the fourteenth century that the name was changed to the "guild of grocers," which depicted on its coat of arms six cloves.

Venice at its height traded in spices to the amount of $10,000,000 annually, and it vied with Portugal in securing cargoes from far Eastern ports. Columbus was bound for the spices of the East when he chanced upon a new continent, and Vasco de Gama, the famous sea fighter, made one of his most important voyages to secure a cargo of pepper, cinnamon and ginger from India.

PERSONAL APPEARANCE

Is now more than ever the key-note of success. Bow-Legged and Knock-Kneed men and women, both young and old, will be glad to hear that I have now ready for market my new appli a n c e , which will successfully straighten within a short time bow-leggedness and knock-kneed legs, safely, quickly and permanently, without pain, operation or discomfort. Will not interfere with your daily work, being worn at night. My new "Lim-Straightner," Model 18, U. S. Patent, is easy to adjust; its result will save you soon from further humiliation, and improve your personal appearance 100 per cent.

Write today for my free copyrighted physiological and anatomical book which tells you how to correct bow and knock-kneed legs without any obligation on your part. Enclose a dime for postage.

M. TRILETY, SPECIALIST
525 L. Ackerman Building, Binghamton, N. Y.

Factory Sale

Durable Strong

NEW Model BOILER and Storage Can

Made of extra strong, heavy pure copper, with a 5-inch Solid Brass Cap and Spout. Rubber gasket between cover and shoulder makes airtight fit. Easily cleaned. No Screw Cap, no threads to get out of order. No burning of hands, no trouble in taking off cover. Cap can be put on or taken off in a second by a simple twist of the thumb-screw on the top. Safe, practical, simple and durable. No article of such quality and utility ever sold at such low price. It's a low pressure boiler and pasturizer. An ideal cooker for the home. Nothing better for general usages such as storing oils, gasoline, etc. It lasts a lifetime and gives real service and satisfaction. Above are strictly cash with order Factory prices. Send money order or check. Prompt shipment in plain strong box. Only can worth having. Catalogue Free. HOME MANUFACTURING CO. Dept. 628 321 W. Chicago Ave., Chicago, Illinois the home. Nothing better for general usages such as storing oils, gasoline, etc. It lasts a lifetime and gives real service and satisfaction. Above are strictly cash with order Factory prices. Send money order or check. Prompt shipment in plain strong box. Only can worth having. Catalogue Free. HOME MANUFACTURING CO. Dept. 628 321 W. Chicago Ave., Chicago, Illinois

CONGO DIAMONDS

Look Prosperous. This beautiful Congo Diamond is positively the nearest approach to the genuine on the market. Most fiery, brilliant and dazzling ever found. Two karat size. Only finest diamonds have blazing brilliance and dazzling fire of this gem. Latest handsome design mounting. Order your ring now! This low price is for limited time only. Send no money. Pay postman $2.65. We pay postage. State size. Ladies or gents. If not delighted, we will return your money. Write now while this offer lasts.

RAYMOND WALTER CO.,
Dept. 458 - 299 Montgomery St., Jersey City, N. J.

Solid Silver-Platinum Finish
$2.65

Ball and Glove FREE

Genuine REACH Fielder's Glove Regulation Ball-Horsehide Cover Boys! how would you like to have Christy Mathewson and Walter Johnson teach you "HOW TO PITCH" FREE

9 in. 5oz. LEAGUE

Write for 24 packages Perfumed Sachet, sell at 10¢ each, send us the $2.40 when sold, and we will send you FREE a Genuine Reach, all Leather Fielder's Glove, Regulation size Ball with Real Horsehide Cover and Illustrated Book by 6 of the World's Greatest Pitchers, showing how to pitch their way. JONES MFG. CO. Dept. 880 Attleboro, Mass.

No Money In Advance

This Marvelous CAMERA On FREE Trial!

Only 10,000 of these marvelous, instantaneous picture-taking and making cameras to be sent out absolutely on approval without a penny in advance just to prove that it is the most wonderful invention—the camera sensation of the age. So you must send for it quick! Just think of it—the new Mandel-ette

TAKES AND MAKES Finished Pictures Instantly

You press the button, drop card in developer and in one minute take out a perfect, finished postcard photo 2 1/4 x 3 1/4 inches in size. Camera, itself, is about 4 1/4 x 5 x 7 inches. Loads in daylight 16 to 60 post cards at one time.

No Films—No Plates—No Dark Room

Not a bit of the muss and bother of the ordinary kodak or camera. It is instantaneous photography. Universal focus lens produces sharp pictures at all distances. Pictures develop and print automatically. Can't overdevelop; results simply amazing.

We Trust You

No difference who you are, where you live or what your age, we will send you the complete "Mandel-ette" outfit absolutely on approval and give you 10 days to test it. If not satisfactory return it. But when you see what elegant pictures it takes—so quick, so easy, with no trouble at all—if you wish to keep it you simply send us 50¢ per week until our special price of only $10.00 is paid.

Easy Payments—No References

No red tape of any kind. Weekly payments so small you'll not notice them. Lots of fun and big profits.

No Experience Required

Plain instructions and everything complete with outfit so you can begin taking pictures the moment it arrives. We guarantee that even a child can operate it. Mail coupon right now. No risk or obligation to keep camera.

The Chicago Ferrottype Co.

2309 W. Erie St., Desk 175, Chicago, Ill.

Send me at once one complete model Mandel-ette Camera outfit including supply of post cards and instructions. I agree to examine and test it thoroughly and if satisfied keep it and pay you 50¢ a week until your special price of $10.00 is paid. Otherwise I will return it at the end of 10 days.

Name.....

St. and No.....

Town..... State.....

FAME AND FORTUNE WEEKLY

— LATEST ISSUES —

- 927 Fighting for Fame; or, The Luck of a Young Contractor.
- 928 Seeking a Lost Treasure; or, The Nerve of a Young Explorer.
- 929 Matt the Mechanic; or, The Boy Who Made His Pile.
- 930 Among the Ice Peaks; or, The Voyage That Made the Money.
- 931 The Little Castaways; or, The Fortune That a Wreck Brought.
- 932 Taking Big Chances; or, The Boy Who Saved a Town.
- 933 Always Lucky; or, Winning on His Merits.
- 934 Out for a Corner; or, A Smart Chicago Boy.
- 935 The Winning Trick; or, How a Boy Made His Mark.
- 936 The Young Editor; or, Running a Country Newspaper.
- 937 A Big Stroke; or, The Lad Who Made a Record.
- 938 In the Copper Fields; or, The Mine That Made the Money.
- 939 From a Cent to Fortune; or, A Chicago Boy's Great Scoop.
- 940 A Start in Life; or, A Poor Boy's Rise to Fame.
- 941 A Wide-Awake Boy; or, Born With a Winning Streak.
- 942 Capturing the Money; or, How Ben Bailey Made His Mark.
- 943 Digging for Gold; or, The Luck of a Boy Miner.
- 944 A Boy with Grit; or, Earning an Honest Living.
- 945 Andy the Mill Boy; or, Rising to the Top.
- 946 Fame Before the Footlights; or, The Boy Who Bossed the Theatre.
- 947 Lucky Lee the Office Boy; or, The Nerviest Lad in New York.
- 948 Sure to Get Rich; or, A Smart Young Messenger.
- 949 Pushing It Through; or, The Fate of a Lucky Day.
- 950 A Born Speculator; or, The Young Sphinx of Wall Street.
- 951 The Way to Success; or, The Boy Who Got There.
- 952 Struck Oil; or, The Boy Who Made a Million.
- 953 A Golden Risk; or, The Young Miners of Della Cruz.
- 954 A Sure Winner; or, The Boy Who Went Out With a Circus.

For sale by all newsdealers, or will be sent to any address on receipt of price, 7c. per copy, in money or postage stamps.

THE FOLLOWING NUMBERS PRICE 8 CENTS

- 955 Golden Fleece; or, The Boy Brokers of Wall Street.
- 956 A Mad Cap Scheme; or, The Boy Treasure Hunters of Cocos Island.
- 957 Adrift On the World; or, Working His Way to Fortune.
- 958 Playing to Win; or, The Foxiest Boy in Wall Street.
- 959 Tatters; or, a Boy From the Slums.
- 960 A Young Monte Cristo; or, The Richest Boy in the World.
- 961 Won by Pluck; or, The Boys Who Ran a Railroad.
- 962 "Beating the Brokers; or, The Boy Who Couldn't Be Done.
- 963 A Rolling Stone; or, The Brightest Boy on Record.
- 964 Never Say Die; or, The Young Surveyor of Happy Valley.
- 965 Boss of the Market; or, The Greatest Boy in Wall Street.
- 966 The Chance of His Life; or, The Young Pilot of Crystal Lake.
- 967 Striving for Fortune; or, From Bell-Boy to Millionaire.
- 968 Out for Business; or, The Smartest Boy in Town.

HARRY K. WOLFF, Publisher, Inc.,

166 West 23d Street

New York City

SCENARIOS

HOW TO WRITE THEM

Price 35 Cents Per Copy

This book contains all the most recent changes in the method of construction and submission of scenarios. Sixty Lessons, covering every phase of scenario writing. For sale by all Newsdealers and Bookstores. If you cannot procure a copy, send us the price, 35 cents, in money or postage stamps, and we will mail you one, postage free. Address.

L. Senarens, 210 Seventh Ave., New York, N. Y.

OUR TEN-CENT HAND BOOKS

Useful, Instructive, and Amusing. They contain Valuable Information on Almost Every Subject.

No. 37. HOW TO KEEP HOUSE.—It contains information for everybody, boys, girls, men and women; it will teach you how to make almost everything around the house, such as parlor ornaments, brackets, cements, Aeolian harps, and bird lime for catching birds.

No. 38. HOW TO BECOME YOUR OWN DOCTOR.—A wonderful book, containing useful and practical information in the treatment of ordinary diseases and ailments common to every family. Abounding in useful and effective recipes for general complaints.

No. 40. HOW TO MAKE AND SET TRAPS.—Including hints on how to catch moles, weasels, otter, rats, squirrels and birds. Also how to cure skins. Copiously illustrated.

No. 41. THE BOYS OF NEW YORK END MEN'S JOKE BOOK.—Containing a great variety of the latest jokes used by the most famous end men. No amateur minstrel is complete without this wonderful little book.

No. 42. THE BOYS OF NEW YORK STUMP SPEAKER.—Containing a varied assortment of stump speeches, Negro, Dutch and Irish. Also end men's jokes. Just the thing for home amusement and amateur shows.

No. 43. THE BOYS OF NEW YORK MINSTREL GUIDE AND JOKE BOOK.—Something new and very instructive. Every boy should obtain this book, as it contains full instructions for organizing amateur minstrel troupes.

No. 52. HOW TO PLAY CARDS.—Giving the rules and full directions for playing Euchre, Cribbage, Casino, Forty-Five, Rounce, Pedro Sancho, Draw Poker, Auction Pitch, All Fours, and many other popular games of cards.

No. 53. HOW TO WRITE LETTERS.—A wonderful little book, telling you how to write to your sweetheart, your father, mother, sister, brother, employer; and, in fact, everybody and anybody you wish to write to.

No. 54. HOW TO KEEP AND MANAGE PETS.—Giving complete information as to the manner and method of raising, keeping, taming, breeding, and managing all kinds of pets; also giving full instructions for making cages, etc. Fully explained by twenty-eight illustrations.

No. 55. HOW TO COLLECT STAMPS AND COINS.—Containing valuable information regarding the collecting and arranging of stamps and coins. Handsomely illustrated.

No. 57. HOW TO MAKE MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.—Full directions how to make a Banjo, Violin, Zither, Aeolian Harp, Xylophone and other musical instruments; together with a brief description of nearly every musical instrument used in ancient or modern times. Profusely illustrated. By Algernon S. Fitzgerald, for twenty years bandmaster of the Royal Bengal Marines.

No. 58. HOW TO BECOME A DETECTIVE.—By Old King Brady, the world-known detective. In which he lays down some valuable and sensible rules for beginners, and also relates some adventures and experiences of well-known detectives.

No. 60. HOW TO BECOME A PHOTOGRAPHER.—Containing useful information regarding the Camera and how to work it; also how to make Photographic Magic Lantern Slides and other Transparencies. Handsomely illustrated.

No. 64. HOW TO MAKE ELECTRICAL MACHINES.—Containing full directions for making electrical machines, inductions coils, dynamos, and many novel toys to be worked by electricity. By R. A. R. Bennett. Fully illustrated.

No. 65. MULDOON'S JOKES.—The most original joke book ever published, and it is brimful of wit and humor. It contains a large collection of songs, jokes, conundrums, etc., of Terrence Muldoon, the great wit, humorist, and practical joker of the day.

No. 67. HOW TO DO ELECTRICAL TRICKS.—Containing a large collection of instructive and highly amusing electrical tricks, together with illustrations. By A. Anderson.

No. 68. HOW TO DO CHEMICAL TRICKS.—Containing over one hundred highly amusing and instructive tricks with chemicals. By A. Anderson. Handsomely illustrated.

For sale by all newsdealers, or will be sent to any address on receipt of price, 10c. per copy, in money or stamps, by

HARRY E. WOLFF, Publisher, Inc.

166 West 23d Street

New York City

